Manijeh entered. The Queen was lying down on her luxurious sofa as usual. Underneath the sofa was a basket of embroidery which Manijeh had never seen the Queen touch. She is so lazy! Lazier than the last queen! But at least she's nice. She doesn't get angry and throw dishes like that last queen did. I shouldn't complain... working only one day a week isn't so bad!

Manijeh gently placed the tray on the table adjacent to the sofa. "Manijeh, you may return in two hours to clear the dishes." The Queen sipped her goblet of grape juice, washed her hands in the little basin next to her, and began eating her pita.

When the maid returned, the Queen had finished eating. "I think I'll rest for awhile now," she announced, and lay down as Manijeh closed the curtains and removed the tray from the table. Manijeh quietly left the room and carried the tray back to the kitchen.

Shushan, Persia, was a dangerous place to be a Jew. But the Queen of the whole world was Jewish. Queen Esther employed a different maid for each day of the week. She did this so that the maids wouldn't notice that she acted differently on Fridays and Saturdays. The Queen prepared for the Sabbath every Friday, and she rested and enjoyed Shabbat on Friday night and Saturday. Nobody found out Esther's secret until the fateful night when she herself announced her Jewishness to the King, and saved her people.

Hockey Night in Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The backyard rink has an almost mythological status in Canada, sort of like the log cabin to our neighbours to the south. The great Wayne Gretzky practically grew up on one, so it only makes sense that when the Israeli national junior team visits Toronto next week, they'll get the full Canadian hockey treatment, including a jaunt on a 50-by-80-foot rink in the Forest Hill neighbourhood.

The rink is being made available by Michael Budman; he and Don Green are the principals behind Roots Canada. Their contribution is part of a community-wide effort to welcome the 19 visiting members of the Israeli team for their one-week hockey tour of Toronto.

In addition to the backyard skate, the Israelis will play five exhibition games against local high schools and community teams, practise at the RINX skating and entertainment complex, visit the Hockey Hall of Fame, take in an OHL major junior game, tour Jewish schools, and get together with Canadian youngsters.

Coming from a country where hockey is more of a curiosity than a popular sport, the Israelis' hockey immersion will no doubt leave lasting memories (and, quips event co-ordinator Eli Rubenstein, perhaps the mistaken impression that everyone in Canada has a backyard rink). It should also help improve the balance sheet of the Israeli hockey federation, which has fallen on tough times recently as the hard-pressed Israeli government cuts back on spending.

Businessman and philanthropist Edward Bronfman has agreed to to support the Jewish state's hockey program with $25,000, channeled through a family foundation affiliated with the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's endowment fund. He'll also drop the puck at the juniors' exhibition game against the CHAT Tigers, which will be held at the Herb Carnegie Centennial Arena, Bathurst and Finch, at 5:30 p.m. on Monday, Feb. 18.

Moshe Eizenman isn't sure how many youngsters will turn out for the game, but if history is any indication, the numbers should be good. Two years ago, the Israelis visited Montreal and drew between 500 and 600 cheering youngsters to a game against Bialik, the city's Jewish high school.

Eizenman was at that game and felt the atmosphere and the high spirits; and the identification of the local Jews with Israeli skaters was good for Jewish unity.

He also had a personal interest in the game. Two of his sons, Alon and Erez, have played for the junior nationals as well as the country's senior team, while his third son, Oren, plays for CHAT and the Israeli juniors.

Eizenman believes that a week-long tour by the Israeli team would not only help them improve their hockey skills, but would "link the Canadian and Israeli communities through hockey.

"The team will go to schools and talk about hockey in Israel and life for teens in Israel," Eizenman said.

Jerry Tolinsky, director of development at CHAT, saw the hockey game as "an opportunity to infuse a little bit of support for Israel in our youth" through a game that Canadians love.

That's just what Eizenman is hoping for. "The aim of this project is to foster a relationship between the two communities and if the situation in Israel will become more stable, people from Canada will go to Canada Centre and interact with their Israeli counterparts," he said.

Canada Centre is the recreation complex in Metulla, on Israel's northern border, built largely with funds donated by Canadians. With an Olympic-sized rink, it is home to the junior team, which draws primarily on skaters from northern communities.

Young Canadians have volunteered at the centre, teaching Israelis skating and hockey skills. NHL coach Roger Neilson has sponsored hockey schools at the centre on several occasions.

With the help of local volunteers, the support of the UJA Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and donations from local businesspeople, the project was quickly brought together.

Jeff Budd, the Toronto-based manager of the junior team, said the Toronto visit will help the Israeli team develop in advance of next year's International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) qualification tournament. Though the Israelis who live near Metulla practice three times a week, their competition level is low. Playing exhibitions versus CHAT and others will help sharpen their skills, he said.

In addition to CHAT, Forest Hill Collegiate will provide competition for the Israelis, as well as select teams from the Avenue Road Hockey Association, the Forest Hill Hockey Association and the Vaughan Hockey Association.

Practice time at RINX has been donated and the team is also hoping to receive contributions of equipment to help replenish the Canada Centre's stocks, Budd said.

For more information about the CHAT exhibition game, call 416-635-2883 ext. 248 or visit www.jewishtoronto.net.

This could be Russia's year

By LARRY RUCH
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Team Canada will take to the ice in Salt Lake City with a very impressive lineup. Any team sporting the likes of Joe Sakic, Mario Lemieux and Rob Blake cannot be easily dismissed.

The Winter Olympics should also be an excellent opportunity for Paul Kariya to stand out and prove his worth. It's time for the Kariyas, Sakics, and Brodeurs to take charge on the ice. It's interesting that we still have to rely on Lemieux, and even a retired Wayne Gretzky, to reclaim our hockey glory. However, without repeating the common concerns for this team (i.e. no Patrick Roy), here are some thoughts.

COACHING

Perhaps the biggest question mark for Canada will be its coaching staff. In a short tournament such as the Olympics, "game coaching" is crucial. Player selection and matching lines requires a coach who can read the opposition and match players accordingly. There is no one better at this than Scotty Bowman or Mike Keenan. Toronto Maple Leaf coach Pat Quinn does not appear as quick. And with the Leafs' Curtis Joseph on the team, he will have to deal with the "do I sit my club goalie and face his wrath all year" syndrome, which seemed to have influenced former Colorado Avalanche head coach Marc Crawford when he refused to sit Patrick Roy in Nagano in 1998. Jacques Martin will do a great job in preparing the team, while Ken Hitchcock, despite being fired recently, brings Stanley Cup coaching experience to the trio. But there is still no better game-day coach in hockey than Bowman.

THE GRETZKY FACTOR

While Gretzky's role as executive director of Canada's Olympic hockey program is welcomed, I am getting the feeling once again that Canada is starting to use the old "pond-shinny shtick" for motivation ("when I grew up, under a freezing but clear Manitoba sky, my dad would water our backyard rink every day at 5:00 a.m. and blah blah blah..."). For years this has defined hockey's romantic spirit and the vital attachment we have towards the game. Unfortunately, while we were writing and singing the praises of our game (thanks Ken Dryden), the Swedes and the Swiss were studying our sport, training and hiring professional coaches to develop their minor hockey players.(I don't know, but the recent Wayne Gretzky commercial, "the Gretzky Puck," seems a bit too much.) Then again, this is exactly how I grew up with hockey, with my dad doing the same things.

But nothing works better on Canadian hockey players than embarrassing them with criticism of their personal performances and applying extreme pressure (again, Mr. Keenan, where are you?). This is no time to get warm and fuzzy.

OPPOSITION

Team Canada's biggest challenge, and every team's for that matter, will come from the Russians. After years of criticizing the Russian hockey federation, Slava Fetisov gets his chance to run the show. The players will be motivated to play for him, and, after years of sub-par performances, they are due.

As for the other traditionally strong teams, hiring Herb Brooks, who coached a surprising U.S. team to gold at Lake Placid in 1980, to lead Team USA is a great move. And don't underestimate the influence of Sept.11 on this team, especially playing on American soil. The Czechs might be relying too much on Dominik Hasek, the Swedes on Mats Sundin and the Finns will miss Saku Koivu. Watch for the Swiss to improve and impress.

STYLE OF PLAY

In order to win, Team Canada will have to come up big at the right moments. Goaltending will not win or lose the tournament. Curtis Joseph, Ed Belfour and Martin Brodeur are more than adequate. The bigger concerns will be the health of Lemieux and the mental strength of Theo Fleury. Team Canada will have to pressure hard, while remembering not to chase the puck wildly, given the bigger ice surface. When the chips are down, the Europeans will not hesitate to quickly shorten their bench and go with three, or sometimes two, lines. Coach Quinn will have to be ready to pick this up. I hope Team Canada does not split up its coaching staff by defencemen and forwards, since this takes away the head coach's ability to match units.

PREDICTION

1. Russia is due. Everything seems in place, and with Fetisov behind the bench, you have a coach the players want to play for.
2. Canada will be the most interesting team to watch but might come up a bit short.
3. After Sept. 11, with the home crowd and a great, experienced team, you have to like the Americans' chances. Perhaps the upset team of the tournament. Brooks is also head coach. He brings the memory of 1980's unexpected "miracle on ice" to the forefront, but he is also an expert in international hockey.

Larry Ruch is program director of Huron Hockey at the University of Ottawa and coached for nine years in Switzerland and Austria.

'Indiana' Bahat?

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Say the words "Ark of the Covenant" and "archeology," and I'm there – ready for swagger and derring-do with a Harrison Ford lookalike clad in a rakish fedora and bullwhip.

While Prof. Dan Bahat has the whiff of adventure about him – he has, after all, led some two dozen major archeological digs in Jerusalem and is considered a heavy-hitting digger – he's no Indiana Jones. That's probably just as well, because at some point, ark fans need to disengage from Hollywood's melting Nazi faces and get at the truth.

The truth, in this case, is disappointing. Despite the title of his tantalizing lecture – "Where is the Ark of the Covenant?" – there's no way of knowing, where the ark is, or even if it still exists, Bahat says with an almost blasé finality.

Darn. I was hoping that any of the current "Where's the ark?" theories, which range from the believable to the ridiculous, would one day be proven right. To wit: The ark is under the Dome of the Rock; in catacombs beneath the Temple Mount; buried in a cave under the place where Jesus was crucified; somewhere in the Judean desert near where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found; in yet another cave on Mount Nebo, where Moses viewed the Promised Land; in France (!), where it was brought by the medieval Knights Templar; in the basement of a church in Axum, Ethiopia; or, of course, crated and stored in a giant government warehouse in Washington, D.C.

As a senior archeologist at Bar-Ilan University, Bahat, a solid man with a shiny pate and the most impressive push-broom moustache you ever saw, has heard all those and more. He does credit Raiders of the Lost Ark with rekindling popular interest in the tale of history's most revered artifact. Another cool tidbit: Bahat knows the real Indiana Jones: an amateur archeologist from Texas named Vendyl Jones, who has stubbornly scoured the caves of Qumran for 20 years in search of the ark, and found little but rocks. "He's a bit crazy," Bahat says of Indy's cinematic prototype, "but I like him."

The ark, as we know by now, was the chest in which the desert-bound Children of Israel carried the Ten Commandments. It resembled, Bahat says, a gilded box on a stretcher, bookended by two cherubs. The Bible says God resided in the ark, and legend has ascribed to it unspeakable powers and allure. After being brought to the Promised Land, it was captured by the Philistines, who were smitten with tumours and swellings for their troubles. It ended up in the inner sanctum of the First Temple, and then disappeared in the Babylonian sack of Jerusalem in 586 BCE.

This we're nearly certain of, says Bahat, brought to Toronto for a series of lectures by the Israel Government Tourist Office. Everything else is pure speculation. But as a purely intellectual exercise, he's willing to entertain all theories. And shoot them down.

I immediately ask whether he's at least curious about what's in that church basement in Ethiopia, guarded only by a mysterious monk armed with a cross who allows no one in. "No," Bahat states flatly. "Because I know there's nothing there." He then turns the tables on his interlocutor: "If you had the ark, what would you do with it?"

"Charge admission," I say immediately.

"Ah…" the professor nods.

As for being touted as a modern-day Indiana Jones, Bahat rolls his eyes. For one thing, he's a medievalist, and his specialty are the tunnels beneath the Western Wall. "I'm not looking for the ark, and I'm not going to for one simple reason," he says dryly. "It doesn't exist anymore and no one will ever find it. The rest is pure nonsense. And all those who introduce me as Indiana Jones… it's pure nonsense. And if you decided beforehand what you're looking for, you'll never find it."

Darn.

But he does leave a door open: Bahat is now searching for remnants of the First Temple, and "Who knows what we'll find?"

That's better. And I'm watching the movie tonight. Again.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

The man who does not read good books has no advantage over the man who can't read them. – Mark Twain

We are part of a literate culture in which naming something gives it a new significance. Indeed, naming is literally signification. Labelling a child with the term "special," as euphemistic as the word attempts to be, is dangerous. In many cases, it transforms a minor learning disorder into a major stigma, sometimes for much longer than the disorder is an obstacle to learning and development.

This explains the motto we chose at the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education for our new special education co-ordinating unit: Tikun Chaim. "Isn't every child special?" sums up for us the notion that every child is a unique type of learner, and that the more we individualize our approach to each child while maintaining a diverse community of learners, the better we will all learn, students and teachers alike.

When we label a child "bright," "slow," "challenged" or "dumb," we have revealed much more about ourselves than about the child's true abilities. We have before us a learner who perhaps conceptualizes quicker and more creatively than the teacher. Call that "bright" or "gifted" and you understand the fear the teacher is feeling more than you understand the way that particular child will learn best.

Or maybe we have a youngster who understands well when spoken to face-to-face, clearly, and in a raised voice. Of course, the hearing problem must be dealt with, but the label "hearing-impaired" tells us very little about the totality of that student.

The great danger of such labelling (useful as it is in categorization and theoretical discussion) is the concomitant step of exclusion. How many times were parents told, in our own Jewish day schools, that a child with a learning problem could not handle the "double load" (another label)? This false assumption that the public school single load is acceptable for average and "below-average children" (more labels!), while the day school double load of general and Jewish studies is for "above-average children" (you get the point!) has wrongly excluded many children who had a right to a full education, and could have handled it.

But that, hopefully, is in the past. We now have principals, parents and teachers who identify problems early, search for creative learning strategies, and include as many children as possible in our schools. While there are still sad stories of children excluded completely from any form of Jewish education, more and more special students are finding their place in mainstream day school classes, at She'arim, at Zareinu, or in supplementary schools.

The labels that were once signals for exclusion are becoming gateways to inclusion, because every child is special.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Bombardier still bidding on Israeli rail contract

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bombardier Inc. is denying published reports that it is pulling out of a consortium bidding on a Jerusalem light rail line, but another Canadian company, engineering firm SNC Lavalin, said the threat of working under fire has prompted it to withdraw from a competing bid on the project.

Bombardier spokesperson Lydia Dufresne said the company "is not withdrawing from the consortium.

"A tender is to be submitted in the next few weeks and right now Bombardier is still discussing it with members of the consortium," she said.

Canadians win gold in bridge

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — CJN bridge columnist Fred Gitelman was part of a six-man team that won Canada's first gold medal in Salt Lake City.

Although it wasn't an officially sanctioned Olympic medal, the Canadian team's gold came at the recent International Olympic Committee (IOC) Grand Prix championship tournament, which included top bridge teams from around the world.

The underdog Canadians shocked the top-seeded entries from Italy and Poland in the final rounds to win the most prestigious invitational bridge event being held this year.

Gitelman, from Toronto, and partner Joseph Silver, from Montreal, assured Canada of a gold in the title match against the heavily favoured Polish team, winning the title by a single trick on the last play of the cards.

The News in Brief

CANADA

No to Icke

VANCOUVER — Two more local theatres have declined to host a two-day seminar by British conspiracy theorist David Icke. Last month, the Ridge Theatre declined Icke space for his talks. Recently, the Vogue and Hollywood theatres have also refused to rent their venues to Icke, whose writings contain numerous references to the Protocols of the Elders of Zion and other anti-Semitic conspiracies.

ISRAEL

Mob Justice

JERUSALEM — A Palestinian mob stormed a West Bank court house last week and killed three defendants who had been charged with a vigilante killing. The Feb. 5 slayings in Nablus, where two dozen gunmen led a crowd of hundreds of angry protesters, appeared to be part of a clan feud. Associated Press reported that the three defendants were killed in the court's bathroom, where police hid them after the mob charged into the building. The gunmen pushed their way into the bathroom, pumped dozens of bullets into the three and dragged their bodies into the streets, shooting in the air in triumph, AP reported. The three victims had been dressed in Palestinian police uniforms, apparently because court officials, expecting trouble, had tried to disguise their identities.

Bigamy Offense

JERUSALEM — Popular Israeli singer Mati Caspi has been found guilty of bigamy. A court ruled last week that Caspi remarried in the United States in 1994 without having divorced his first wife, an Israeli. The court rejected a religious divorce Caspi obtained from a Beverly Hills rabbi. It said the only rabbinical court authorized to rule on the matter was one in Israel, where Caspi's initial divorce request had been rejected. Caspi could face a jail sentence of up to three years.

WORLD

Trade Centre Opens

MOSCOW — A Russian-Israeli trade centre has opened in Moscow. A group of Israeli businessmen led by Natan Sharansky, Israel's housing minister and a former refusenik, was visiting Moscow for the opening. Israeli exports to Russia totaled $170 million (US) in 2001, an increase of 16 per cent over the previous year.

Students Attacked

PARIS — Some 40 youths attacked a group of Jewish students leaving school Jan. 31 in the Paris suburb of Montreuil. According to witnesses, the assailants, many of whom covered their faces with Palestinian scarves, sprayed mace in the faces of several of the Jewish youths. French authorities are investigating. A week earlier, a school bus carrying Jewish children was stoned as it passed a housing project in the nearby suburb of Aubervilliers.

Ethiopian Ordained

NEW YORK — The Conservative movement recently ordained its first Ethiopian-born rabbi. Rabbi Yafet Alemu, who lives in Jerusalem, formally becomes a member of the group's Rabbinical Assembly at the Conservative movement conference, which ends this week in Washington.

Ghetto Dr. Dies

WARSAW — Dr. Arnold Mostowicz, who treated fellow Jews in the Lodz Ghetto during World War II, died here Feb. 3. He was 87. Mostowicz played an active role in the Resistance and was deported to Auschwitz after the Lodz Ghetto was liquidated in 1944.

Peru's Door Open

NEW YORK — The president of Peru is opening his country to distressed Jews of Argentina. Speaking before the American Jewish Committee last week, Alejandro Toledo said he is considering incentives to bring Argentine Jews to Peru. Toledo's wife, Eliane Karp de Toledo, is Jewish, and in his talk, he expressed fondness for Israel.

Victim Wins Suit

NEW YORK — A U.S. court has awarded $183 million (US) in damages from Iran to the family of Ira Weinstein, who died in a 1996 bus bombing in Israel that killed 25 people. Hamas, which is supported by Iran, claimed responsibility for the attack. The families of two other Americans killed in the attack have already received damages given by the United States against frozen Iranian assets.

Layoffs at Hadassah HQ

NEW YORK — As Hadassah prepares to celebrate its 90th anniversary, the women's Zionist organization has laid off 10 per cent of the staff at its U.S. headquarters here.

Hadassah officials said the layoffs were necessary, and assured that the group's programs will be left intact.

But some insiders say the dramatic cutbacks casts doubt on the organization's ability to remain a leader in the Jewish community.

Hadassah, with 300,000 members, is one of the largest women's membership organizations, and the largest Zionist membership organization in the United States.

Before the cuts, the organization employed some 200 to 300 people at its headquarters, which also includes a volunteer staff.

Among the departments that lost much of their professional staffs were those devoted to public affairs, Washington affairs and Israel, Zionist and international affairs.

Flaherty: Allowing Shabbat ballot 'a mistake'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario Tory leadership hopeful Jim Flaherty is accusing his own party of making it all but impossible for Sabbath-observant Jews to cast ballots in the March 23 vote to replace Premier Mike Harris.

Asked in a CJN interview last week whether he's disappointed that his party is refusing to allow advance polls for those who observe Saturday as their Sabbath, Flaherty said, "Yes, I am. Quite frankly, the position being taken by some on the [party's] executive is inconsistent with the wishes of the membership."

Party was aware of problem back on Nov. 9

Internal party documents obtained by The CJN show that the PC party was aware of a potential problem as far back as Nov. 9. In a Jan. 9 letter to party president Reuben Devlin, Flaherty blasted the Tories, saying that "as a direct result of its decision to hold the vote on a Saturday, the party has disenfranchised entire segments of the community on the basis of their religious observance."

In a 12-9 vote on Jan. 26, the party's executive chose not to consider advance polls, leaving a proxy vote as the only alternative for the balloting, which takes place on a Saturday.

However, as reported in last week's CJN, a proxy vote is a non-starter for observant Jews, as it is un-halachic. Three rabbis consulted agreed that it is clearly against Jewish law to appoint someone to perform a specific task that is forbidden for Jews on the Sabbath. That means Jews who are shomer Shabbat will be effectively shut out from choosing the next premier of Ontario.

The Saturday vote has disappointed and angered Jewish party members in at least three ridings. They say they are being disenfranchised – just as they were aggressively courted by the party.

Prior to the rabbis' revelation that a proxy vote is untenable for Jews, Jewish party members were concerned that in at least one riding, York Centre, the Sabbath observant far outnumber the non-Sabbath observant, making one-on-one proxy voting mathematically impossible.

Flaherty, one of five leadership candidates, accused his party of showing poor form.

"If the membership were fully consulted on this issue, there'd be no question at all that the executive would be instructed to find a solution that works for the faith communities in Ontario that observe Saturday as their day of rest," he said.

Asked about the executive's decision to disallow advance voting, he said, "they're making a mistake. The entire concept of our party is to be inclusive and welcome everyone to full participation. One of the most important functions the party has is to organize an election for the new leader, and the rules ought to be at least as welcoming as the rules are in general elections in Ontario. Innocent civilians defined Merely three days after Yasser Arafat's op-ed renunciation of terror against innocent civilians appeared in the Sunday New York Times, innocent Israeli civilians were again attacked and murdered by Palestinian murderers.

It happened in Hamra, a small community of about 40 families in the northern Jordan Valley. A Palestinian breached the community's security fence. But because he wore an IDF uniform, the initial reaction to his entry was slow. He started shooting, killed a sentry and then entered one of the homes, where he was himself gunned down by security forces.

In that home, the intruder shot and killed a woman and her 11-year-old daughter.

Hamas claimed "credit" for the murders. In its gushing praise of their fallen comrade, Hamas released a statement that included the following quote by a brother of the murderer: "My brother faced the settlers face to face. He is a hero."

It is a singularly damnable definition of heroism that celebrates the calculated, cold-blooded slaughter of a mother and her 11-year-old child.

Two days later, a 79-year-old woman was shot to death by murdering Palestinians as she was being driven by her son back to her home north of Jerusalem.

On the same day, a 25-year-old woman strolling in the heart of Jerusalem was killed by a gang of four marauding Palestinian teenagers, who set upon her with a howl of terror and stabbed her repeatedly.

As of this writing, there is a fresh news report that two other civilian women were shot to death by Palestinians near the military base in Beersheva.

Last week's toll of murdered and maimed Israelis provides us, tragically, with an exegetical "commentary" on Arafat's New York Times essay, helping us to better understand what he meant by the term "innocent civilians."

It's clear, or should be, to reasonable, fair-minded individuals, that Arafat excludes all Israelis in the term "innocent civilians." In his deceitful, double-speak, coded lexicon of prevarication and charade, what he really means is if they are Israeli, they are neither "innocent" nor "civilian."

Arafat's followers understand the true meaning of his words without the need for commentary. Many westerners, alas, prefer to accept Arafat's mere articulation of lofty terminology, without the slightest reference to the Palestinian Authority (PA) leader's behavioural illuminations and clarifications of his statements.

Nor can these wilfully blind defenders of the Palestinian Authority leader suggest that he does his best, but is impotent in his efforts, to rein in all of the terrorists. For here too, the facts betray their fantasy.

In the first place, the murderers belong to Arafat's own Fatah-affiliated al-Aqsa Brigade and Tanzim, as well as to Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and any of the other murder associations vying for members in Palestinian society.

In the second place, Arafat and his tightly controlled media outlets constantly praise the murderers for their courage and patriotism as martyrs for the cause.

And in the third place, Arafat's police and security officials routinely release people they have "arrested." Immediately after the Hamra massacre, the PA police released 25 prisoners belonging to Hamas and Islamic Jihad from their cells in Nablus. Among those released were two individuals whom Washington had asked Arafat to arrest. In Jenin, seven more "detainees" were released by the PA at the insistence of the mob.

There are, of course, other "places" to look for the truth about Yasser Arafat's intentions toward Israel and the Jewish people. The most disheartening is the morally inverted ethos that appears increasingly to dominate the society he has fostered.

Ha'aretz last week reported on the macabre, surreal debate about feminism in Islam that has erupted in various Palestinian and wider Arab media in the wake of the suicide bombing by Wafa Idris last month in downtown Jerusalem, in which one Israeli was killed and some 140 others were wounded. The bombing occurred at a busy time of the shopping day, at an intersection in Jerusalem that is comparable to Peel and Sainte-Catherine streets in Montreal or Yonge and Dundas in Toronto. Maximum human carnage was intended and attempted by Idris.

The debate concerned the permissibility in Islam of women carrying out such bombings. The opinions were divided among religious authorities. One religious leader, Hasan Yusuf wrote that "Jihad against the enemy is an obligation borne... also by women." Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, however, partially dissented, saying that "while a woman is entitled to take part in jihad, a man must supervise and travel with her if she is to be gone longer than a night and a day."

The debate did not turn on the permissibility of wanton killing. That was a given. Rather it dealt only with the permissibility of a woman as the killer.

In the Arab world, Idris has been widely celebrated as a hero. Ha'aretz reported that "scarcely a day goes by without five to 10 articles being published in praise of her act. Arab pundits compare her to Joan of Arc."

If Yasser Arafat's feelings were hurt because the Idris debate ignored totally his statement on "innocent victims," he can at least take some satisfaction in knowing he was published in the New York Times.

Personality change calls for medical consultation

How do you know when it's time to seek medical advice about a subtle change in a loved one's memory or personality?

In my experience, I've found that the person closest to the individual in question may not notice the subtle changes for quite a while and simply attributes the problems to age or hearing loss. The spouse or child may be so used to directing activities that they don't realize the other person is participating in decision-making less and less.

When a problem is suspected, it should be brought to the attention of the family physician. Keep in mind that not every event of memory loss or personality change is due to dementia such as Alzheimer's disease. Many medical conditions can cause such changes including the effects of medication, alcohol, underlying illnesses, depression and other types of dementia. A careful medical review, which may entail various tests, is necessary to put the pieces together.

The biggest challenge for a family member is to recognize that an important change has occurred and to seek a doctor's advice. There may be medical interventions that can change the course of the problem.

COC faces controversy over opera Salome

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Opera Company found itself embroiled in allegations of anti-Semitism with its recent performances of Salome.

The opera, which ran until Feb. 5th, was directed by Atom Egoyan. Salome is based on an 1893 play by Oscar Wilde, which was adapted into opera by Richard Strauss in 1905, and then revised by Egoyan for the current production.

Len Rudner

The character of Salome was developed by Wilde from a few passages drawn from the Christian biblical books of Mark and Matthew dealing with the death of John the Baptist.

King Herod asks his stepdaughter, Salome, to dance for him, telling her to name her price "up to half his kingdom." In return for pleasing King Herod with her dance, Salome asks for John the Baptist's head on a silver platter.

Influenced by Sigmund Freud's theories of the day, the opera portrays Salome as a disturbed woman driven by complex family relationships within a sexually charged household.

In Wilde's version, five Jews are present in Herod's court debating whether the Messiah has come. Strauss portrayed these characters as five Jews who bicker and argue senselessly over religion.

In the current Atom Egoyan version, these five Jews are portrayed as ugly doctors and drug traffickers who brutally rape Salome during her dance. An accompanying film emphasizes Salome's loss of innocence by her sexually abusive stepfather.

In a National Post review, Tamara Bernstein stated that she left the opera "feeling violated as both a woman and a Jew."

"If he had to include a rape, why did Egoyan choose the Jews?" she asked. Bernstein suggested mothballing the opera due to its anti-Semitic and misogynous elements.

In a separate article, Egoyan, known for his films Exotica and The Sweet Hereafter, defended his version of Salome, stating that the acts of the Jews are important to his interpretation of the events.

"This, of course, is not a pretty story," Egoyan wrote. "It also happens to be taking place in a Jewish household in a Jewish court."

Egoyan noted the rape is crucial to his interpretation of Salome's actions and that to use any other characters would have been "dramatically ridiculous."

In response, Bernstein stated the current production "amplifies the anti-Semitism that's already in Strauss's opera without critiquing it."

"By turning the five Jews into doctors, drug traffickers and then rapists" Bernstein said that Egoyan has crossed the line of neutrality given "the context of this opera, the history of Jews in Europe and contemporary politics."

"Since when does the ability to write a 'great' opera exempt composers and librettists from moral scrutiny?" Bernstein asked. "[And] why do so many people look the other way?"

"The artistic choices made by Egoyan were troubling," Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Len Rudner said in an interview.

"As a Jew in the audience, I felt uncomfortable," Rudner added. "I wish that Egoyan had found some other fashion to layer the issues of incest and revenge while being more sensitive to the viewing audience."

In a letter to the Canadian Opera Company, Rudner suggested that in the future the opera consider allowing Congress to comment on ways in which potentially difficult productions could be handled in a sensitive fashion.

Spokesperson Claudine Dominique said that "the COC is pleased to have established contact with the Canadian Jewish Congress."

However, she added, she is not aware of any ramifications this event will have on future artistic choices.

CJC lauds Mac's handling of alleged anti-Semitic incident

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — New operators are running a Mac's convenience store in Thornhill where a cashier allegedly made anti-Semitic remarks to a group of Jewish teens.

Dan Dugas, an operations manager for Mac's Convenience Stores Inc., said the husband and wife who had been running the store at Bathurst Street and Atkinson Avenue had asked for a transfer in November, and since the Jan. 26 incident, Mac's sped up the transfer request.

Mac's is investigating the incident further, Dugas said.

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said the recent move by Mac's shows the company is attentive to the perceptions of the community.

Rudner said he met with the couple, whose daughter allegedly made the anti-Semitic comments.

"These situations are almost always more complex than they seem when they are reported. We have one group claiming someone said something, and we have the cashier's version, which is quite different.

"Because there were no independent witnesses, it is difficult to say what really happened. My general orientation is to give everyone the benefit of the doubt. It is not my place to sit in judgement," said Rudner.

Several years ago, said Rudner, there was a similar incident at the same store and when Mac's investigated, the employee involved was fired. The current Mac's area manager held the same position at the time of the previous incident, but the recently transferred couple were not running the store at the time.

"Mac's has proven that they do take incidents seriously and they do investigate," Rudner said. "What [the company] is doing now, is consistent with the way they behaved before."

CJC Ontario region has tried to establish a relationship with Mac's, said Rudner, so if something happens, the two organizations can decide how to deal with it. "We are building on an existing relationship with Mac's."

The organization has offered to work with Mac's to help them train staff. "Mac's has customer service training, and we've encouraged them to investigate whether further training is required.

"It helps when organizations work closely together rather than go out on an attack. We are attempting to build on the relationship and do the right thing," said Rudner.

Dry Bones
THE NY TIMES PUBLISHED A PASSIONATE ARTICLE BY YASSER ARAFAT...
PROCLAIMING HIS DESIRE FOR PEACE WITH ISRAEL
THEY'RE HAVING THEIR PURIM ISSUE EARLY THIS YEAR?
APPARENTLY SO.

Europe, unhelpful and vindictive

It was not a coincidence that against the backdrop of the visit by Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon with U.S. President George W. Bush in Washington last week, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat announced he had been invited to address the European Parliament on Feb. 18. His announcement was part of a broader statement to his people and to the United States denying any knowledge, let alone involvement, in the ill-fated Karine A.

The statement was concise: "The PA had no knowledge of the shipment; it never decided to purchase arms or smuggle them into Palestinian territory and it has never had any dealings with Iran concerning weaponry. However it has arrested the men allegedly responsible for the smuggling attempt, in order to ascertain the facts and close the case."

The European invitation to the PA leader was part of a broader outline for Middle East peace drawn up by the French government that calls for Palestinian elections and for the creation of a Palestinian state to be immediately recognized by Israel and admitted to the UN.

Last week's coddling of the PA leader by the European Union came on the heels of a threat a week earlier by the EU to seek reparations from the Jewish State for having damaged Palestinian buildings built with EU money. "The EU is seriously concerned at the destruction of Palestinian infrastructure and other facilities which help Palestinians in their economic, social and humanitarian development and which are financed by EU donors…The EU urges the Government of Israel to put an end to this practice and reserves the right to claim reparation…"

The Europeans seem as much embarrassed for themselves as they are upset with Arafat over the Karine A affair. They cannot bring themselves to criticize the PA leader for the violence he allows or the duplicity he practises. On the contrary, they prop him up after each new wave of terror against Israeli citizens.

Yet they find no difficulty in criticizing Israel, and lately, the United States as well. "It is very dangerous," declared Sweden's foreign minister Anna Lindh, "if the U.S. is supportive of the Israeli government and of the confrontation Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has tried to use in the latest weeks…"

This past weekend Israel was again severely excoriated by the EU for its retaliation against the PA after the latest frenzy of murdering Israelis.

But the United States is unable to ignore the mounting evidence of PA complicity in terror and Israel is unwilling to accept as inevitable the murder of its citizens. They refuse any longer to perpetuate blatant mistruths and wishful fantasies about the PA.

The EU's approach to peace in the Middle East is deeply puzzling, to say the least. When combined with the recent alarming wave of anti-Jewish incidents, especially in France and England, and the legal vendetta being waged against Sharon in the human rights courts of Belgium, Europe's approach must be seen for what it truly is: unhelpful and vindictive.

The Globe's "Hobeika File"

Your complaint ("From the Editor's Desk," CJN, Jan. 31) about the failure of the Globe and Mail to be responsible in its recent editorial "The Hobeika File" was further reinforced by that newspaper's choice of letters to the editor. These letter writers, already prejudiced, took the editorial as an invitation to hang Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon without the need for evidence. The Globe had the choice, however, at least for the sake of balance, if not for the sake of the facts, of publishing a letter that was backed by an eyewitness report of the actual events at Sabra and Shatila.

In a letter I sent to the Globe, I cited excerpts from the book From Israel to Damascus by Robert Hatem, who was the bodyguard and driver for Elias Hobeika during the Lebanon War of 1982. The book, which is banned in Syria-controlled Lebanon, can be read on the Internet at www.israeltodamascus.com/thebook.htm.

I cited the following excerpts from Chapter 8 of Hatem's book: "We were to sort out the armed terrorists and hand them over to the Israeli troops at the Cité Sportive… The men were allotted in several units respectively under the command of Joseph Asmar, Michel Zouein, G. Melco and Maroun Mashaalani… Sharon had given strict orders to Hobeika to guard against any desperate move should his men run amuck. They were to behave like a real dignified, regular army – not like 'chocolate soldiers' and coordinate with the Israeli command… After inspection the civilians would be sent back to their homes. However, Hobeika gave his own instructions to his men: 'Total extermination… camps wiped out.' It was Maroun Mashaalani's men, undaunted by their regular and immoderate use of heroine and cocaine who perpetrated the most ghastly slaughters in the camp bordering Ghaza Hospital at the entrance of Sabra…"

The individuals cited in the book can be added to the list of those who would want to silence Hobeika. However, the Globe apparently did not want additional information to get in the way of its opinion and chose not to publish my letter.

It will be interesting to see what the videotaped testimony Hobeika recorded before his death will reveal: did he truthfully point the finger at Maroun Mashaalani or did he put the blame on Sharon?

Although I am not the right person to defend Sharon, directing the blame so facilely at him reminds me of the Yiddish saying: "While one gentile is slaughtering another gentile, both will agree to blame the Jew."

More on the Messiah controversy

As an observant Jew, I am proud of the vital work that Lubavitch has done in outreach and the revitalization of Torah study and observance. However, I am deeply troubled by the view held by some that the deceased Rebbe is the Messiah.

Because such a view is so controversial, it is time for the Lubavitch leadership to issue a clear and unambiguous statement on whether or not it considers the Rebbe to be the Messiah. The movement has been sending out conflicting signals on this matter for far too long.

Look to education, not the court

The best defence against Holocaust deniers and White Power-type propaganda is education. The Nizkor Project has done an excellent job of refuting Zundel's theories, as well as other, similar theories, on its comprehensive Web site (www.nizkor.org).

Such efforts have proven to be much more effective against Internet hate propaganda than the recent court ruling regarding Zundel's Web site. It is folly to believe that court rulings will dissipate anti-Jewish or any other hatred on the Internet. Education and understanding are the best weapons against any kind of racism. Such tactics will keep people like Zundel on the fringes of society, where he belongs.

If we as Jews are concerned about the promotion of racial hatred, then perhaps it's time to introspectively examine the hatred that occurs in our own community, too, such as the anti-Arab invective of most Jewish publications like this one.

Visit Israel now

My wife and I recently visited Israel. We felt more secure in Jerusalem, Haifa or Tel Aviv than we do in large North American cities.

Our brothers and sisters in the Jewish State routinely ask where Canadian and American Jews are now when they are most needed. "Hotels are empty," they point out. "The streets are empty of tourists. By staying home, they are encouraging the terrorists to terrorize! Israel is fighting a war for survival and Diaspora Jews are staying home."

Most terrorist attacks take place in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and are directed at army positions and/or Israeli settlements. There was no sign of terrorism on Tel Aviv streets. The Carmel Market and Nachalat Binyamin Street were crowded with people, young and old, going about their daily lives, wholly unafraid of being blown up.

In Montreal, anti-Israel Jews rally each week in front of the Israeli Consulate to protest the policies of the State of Israel. Why don't other Jewish groups show their support by rallying each week as well, proudly declaring their love and admiration for their Israeli brothers and sisters?

I call on the leaders of the Jewish community to organize regular rallies in support of Israel every week, every month, and not to let the media spotlight fall only on those self-hating Jews.

We must help Israel defy terrorism by being with our State, there and here, today and always. Am Yisrael Chai.

Murder of Hobeika resonates in Belgium

In yet another round of Middle East violence, a car bomb in Beirut last month took the life of Lebanese warlord Elie Hobeika. Hobeika, who was a prominent figure during the Lebanese civil war and later a cabinet minister for the Christian Phalange party, had been out of the news until early January when he met with a group of visiting Belgian senators to discuss evidence against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in a case underway in Brussels.

By ED MORGAN

The Belgian case is actually one of two companion cases dealing with violence in the Middle East. The first one started with a complaint laid against Sharon last July. That indictment relates to a massacre of Palestinian refugees in Lebanon's Sabra and Shatila camps some 20 years ago.

The second case started this past November, when a group calling itself the Victims of Arab Terror filed a similar complaint with the same Belgian court against Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat. This one alleges that a campaign of violence against Israeli civilians has been waged for the past 30 years.

Both cases are now winding their way through the Belgian legal system. Sharon's lawyers have challenged the jurisdiction of the court to try a sitting head of state, and Arafat's legal team will doubtless follow suit. But the Americans and the Spanish, in turning their attention to Generals Manuel Noriega and Augusto Pinochet, have already determined that a head of state might be subject to legal attack. Unless Belgium changes its law, the cases are likely to proceed.

What is one to make of this tendency of the world's courts to take on foreign political leaders? These are not UN tribunals or other multilateral bodies engaging in transnational justice. Rather, these are long arm domestic jurisdictions, with Belgium's being the longest, most universal of them all. Some 30 similar cases are pending in Brussels now that the Belgians have set themselves up to judge anyone anywhere.

Now this experiment in legal process has taken on the most intractable question in the world: in a violent international conflict where civilian casualties have become the norm, who is the terrorist and how is one to tell?

The British courts have traditionally said that "all justice is local." International law starts with, and struggles against, that basic idea. It makes all the legal difference in the world whether a victim is pushed into the Rio Grande or over Niagara Falls from the north side or the south. The local community is the one generally thought to be in the best position to determine guilt.

Historically, therefore, states were restricted to prosecuting crimes committed on their own territory or to bringing diplomatic complaints directly against other states for offensive conduct abroad. Since World War II, however, the prosecution of war criminals has gone international. The 1946 Nuremberg case, and the 1964 Israeli prosecution of Adolf Eichmann, entrenched the idea in legal circles that crimes against humanity are the business of any state that takes an interest. Laudable as this seems, however, a nagging doubt has persisted over the potential for international justice to be arbitrary justice.

As explained by the French court in the 1984 case of Gestapo chief Klaus Barbie, the Nuremberg Charter addresses incidents that qualify as "a major, orchestrated attack on the very dignity of man." The limiting idea of Nuremberg is that while states get to implement international justice, they must do so on the basis of an individualized assessment of massive culpability. The person cannot be a surrogate for the nation or for political redress.

For this reason, those far-reaching class actions seeking to hold Americans and British liable for such things as failing to bomb the train lines leading to Auschwitz, strike most international lawyers as overstepping the line. There is simply a limit to what can be expected of international actors, just as there is a limit to what one can reasonably expect the law to accomplish. To be effective, legal action needs to be detailed, up close and personal.

Palestinian refugees flock to Beirut in 1982.

While it is still too early to know the specific allegations against Arafat, the Belgian case against Sharon is jarring once this background is kept in mind. The indictment alleges just what a 1984 Israeli commission of inquiry found – that Sharon was negligent in failing to foresee the massacre of Palestinians by the Lebanese Christian Phalange, but that he did not engineer it and that no Israeli soldiers took part. The bloodshed between the Phalangists and the Palestinians came in response to the slaying of Christian Lebanese President Bashir Gemayal and had little to do with Israel's Lebanon incursion.

The disconnect between the Northern European court and the Southern Lebanese events appears to be complete. The Belgian charges deviate substantially from the notion of international justice carefully sculpted at Nuremberg, and can be seen in the international arena floating arbitrarily in the sea of politics. No wonder complainants and defendants, or Sharon and Arafat, can trade places at will.

As if to prove the point, Human Rights Watch wondered aloud last summer about the failure of anyone to bring proceedings against one Elie Hobeika. At the time, most casual observers wondered who the mystery man about whom the world knew so little was. This now seems particularly odd given that the Belgians were interviewing him in January in relation to the Sabra and Shatila case.

The Lebanese businessman and former cabinet minister blown to bits in his Humvee last month was none other than the leader of the militant wing of the Lebanese Christian faction most closely associated with the late President Bashir Gemayal. Hobeika's own lieutenant, in a 1999 book banned in Lebanon, has credited him with leading the Phalange militia that rampaged through the two Palestinian camps in 1982. It was Hobeika's bloodletting that Sharon is accused of, at worst, failing to foresee.

There is a lesson in all this. Some international questions may seem impossible in the abstract, but familiarity with the conflict goes a long way toward sorting it all out. If one party's violence looks just like another's, look a little closer.

Sixty years ago

The year was 1942, when we were embroiled in World War II. At the time, I was living in the United States, and had joined the United States army as a volunteer.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

One of my major hopes was to bring my parents over from Europe. They had fled from Germany and were living in England, but although both of their children were already in the United States, their attempts to obtain a visa to join them had been repeatedly rejected.

They used to write to me and ask why I could not be of help to them – an understandable question – but they did not know that the policy of the United States at the time was not favourable to letting Jewish immigrants into the country. But wearing the uniform of a United States officer, I hoped I would be successful.

Even so, it took some more years to bring them over, and the question of why they were so often refused haunted me. I made various attempts to obtain the necessary information, but it was only when the U.S. Freedom of Information Act was passed that I was finally successful.

It was then that I could obtain the stenographic record of my appearance before a five-person committee reviewing my parents' application, as well as the content of the committee's discussion after I had left. I was shocked to read it.

The record shows that after I had left the room, the commitee's discussion was rather brief. One member was ready to admit my parents, but the other four were against it. The transcript showed the reasons were these:

- "We don't need older people in this country, we need younger people."
- "The applicant [that was I], although appearing in uniform, is a Zionist and therefore an unreliable citizen."

I still recall the shock that came over me when I read these lines. It was an unhappy proof of the fact that anti-Semitism was rampant throughout the U.S. Foreign Service, down to the ordinary members of its committees.

The hurt that possessed me when I read the record has never left me. It prevented our family from being together, and the hiatus lasted for all too many years. When my parents were finally admitted to the United States, I was serving as an officer in the U.S. army in Germany and did not see them until a year later.

This is a sad record of a period when anti-Semitism was pervasive and affected all Jews, whether they were citizens or not.

Fortunately, that kind of policy has changed, but its bitter memory haunts me every once in a while.

Personal safety and The Ten Commandments

It is 4 a.m. as I write this. I should be asleep, but my eyes cannot seem to close long enough for slumber to find me. Every noise I hear makes me jump up, throw on my glasses, turn on my light and look around.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

You see, my house was broken into last weekend. While I was away in Montreal for a short visit, back in Halifax, during the night, an intruder violated my privacy by entering through a door carelessly left unlocked by a couple of my housemates. Thankfully, no one was hurt, or even confronted in any way, but aside from the small material possessions that were stolen (none of mine, since I almost obsessively lock the doors of my personal space every time I leave the house), we are all feeling insecure now.

Maybe I cannot sleep right now because a key to the front door was stolen during the break-in. Even though the locks were changed, I am still terrified at the prospect of the intruder coming back for more.

Ah, the joys of being a student. Right now, I would love nothing more than to be back at my house in Toronto, cuddled up with my dog and only a small yelp away from my parent's bedroom. Instead, I am far away and seeing reality for the first time. Halifax is a relatively safe city, especially in the area surrounding Dalhousie University. However, petty crime has been on the rise and this type of burglary is most common.

Things like this simply do not happen to me. I am responsible and careful and often the subject of many jokes because I act like my cautious mother most of the time. Suddenly, though, I find myself not feeling safe on my own. How pathetic. I am sure that in a few days, this feeling will dissipate, but until then, what do I do?

It is not as if I am the first person to have my house broken into. I was not even here when it happened, yet my roommates have managed to pass on the unpleasantness of the experience to me. I could stay elsewhere tonight, but I fear that if I don't stay here now, it will only become increasingly difficult tomorrow.

People cope, most of the time, with problems much larger than this. To me though, this has really been a trying experience. Particularly difficult has been being away from home and having to deal with something uncomfortable, needing family, but realizing that I must learn to muddle through and to manage on my own.

I have not always been known for obeying all the rules, but the Ten Commandments have generally seemed easy to follow. Al tignov – thou shalt not steal. It is so sad that we have to lock our doors at all times. It is even sadder that I no longer trust "my neighbour," since I truly do not know who he or she really is.

Perhaps that in itself is the real problem here. The Ten Commandments were given to us so that we could lead lives of order and so people could feel safe and live in fulfilling and meaningful ways, yet not enough people are following these rules anymore.

I refuse to lose faith in those sharing this vibrant city with me, but from now on, I will walk around with slightly more cynicism. I will continue to obey The Ten Commandments, as I believe that they are the essence of a fair and honest society, yet I will keep in mind that not all people will do the same. I am afraid of the dark, but I am even more afraid of what can be lurking there.

I know that everything happens for a reason, but that is not too comforting right now: I know that sleep will find me soon, or at least I hope it will. I have an early class tomorrow and would like to go warn my neighbours about what has happened here. Perhaps together we can prevent another unfortunate incident. In any case, life must go on, even in the not-so-sheltered-anymore-world of an arts student.

Until next month, be safe and well and please keep your doors locked!

Biased reporting in the media war

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict has as much to do with the media as it does with guns and bombs.

The media war, as it has been called, is won in the world of public opinion. Flashy pictures of Palestinian kids with Israeli soldiers in the background bring waves of sympathy for the plight of the Palestinians, but these pictures fail to mention that, behind the kids, armed gunmen are shooting at the soldiers.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

I'm sure many readers have felt some sort of injustice from reading biased articles that fail to paint an accurate portrayal of this conflict. While I have always thought this, it was only last week that I became passionate about the uneducated and ignorant reporting of many journalists covering this issue.

I recently attended a journalism conference in Ottawa, where various journalists talked about their work. One of the writers who spoke was Jacki Leroux, a reporter for the Ottawa Sun. In 1998, Leroux was sent to report on five different conflicts around the world, one of which was the Arab-Israeli conflict. While Leroux spoke generally about her experiences covering these conflicts, I read her 12-page article about the Arab-Israeli conflict called "Mortal Enemies," part 2 of the five-part series.

I was very interested in it because of its subject matter, but my interest quickly turned to anger. I don't usually get very worked up over things that I read, but after reading this article, I was fuming.

Leroux tries to mask her bias, but in fact, this article, which was supposed to convey life from both sides, is one of the most one-sided pieces of literature I have ever read.

To do her research, Leroux lived in the Gaza Strip for one month, part of the time with an Arab family and the rest of the time with a Jewish family living on a settlement there. The article talks about the hardships Arabs have to face, and Leroux makes the Jews out to be land robbers who have stolen Arab property. She does talk about the Jews who live on the settlement, and she does use some of the same drama that she pours on when talking about the Arabs, but in the end, these Jews come across looking crazy for living in such a volatile area.

There is a lot more to say about this particular article: from certain descriptive words the author uses to its layout, it all points towards an obvious Palestinian bias.

I asked Leroux what sort of research she did and I was shocked at her response. She told me that she looked on the Internet and did most of her research after she came home from Gaza.

Articles about this issue generally have some major problems, such as the journalist's lack of knowledge about the conflict. Leroux, who had no prior expertise, found most of her information from the unreliable Internet, and she did her research after she came back. If a newspaper is going to send you to cover a story, I think it wouldn't be too much trouble to read a few books on the subject, or in this case, to talk to a professor of Middle Eastern studies.

The Arab-Israeli conflict is very complicated, but there are still two legitimate sides to this issue. I have yet to come across an article that presents those issues in an unbiased way. For example, if Leroux wants to talk about an Arab family losing a loved one because of the Israeli army, why didn't she also live with a family who lost their child to a suicide bomb?

This issue is difficult to discuss in this space. I could talk about the juicy sound bites or pictures the media love to publish – having an Arab child throw rocks while Israeli soldiers have guns is quite dramatic for the human eye. But in any case, I think the reporting by several journalists on this issue is done without knowledge of the conflict and without enough interviews with people from both sides. Leroux's article is just another that is adding heat to the Arab-Israeli media war.

The Kirshner File

Yasser Arafat faces his moment of truth

Clutching my right hand in a sign of friendship, Yasser Arafat said he understood my concern. Minutes before, I had told him that Palestinian terrorism could well be the bane of the Oslo peace process, launched in a flurry of goodwill and optimism in 1993.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Clad in a pale green military uniform and a black and white kaffiyeh, Arafat had just finished speaking to a North American Jewish delegation at his scruffy headquarters in Gaza City. It was November 1994.

Replying to a number of questions about terrorism, he assured us he fully intended to disarm Islamic fundamentalist terrorists, whom he bluntly described as the "enemies of peace." But he added a caveat: the crackdown would be gradual so as to avoid a Palestinian civil war.

Coming on the heels of recent Hamas and Islamic Jihad suicide bombings in Israel, the first of their kind, Arafat's remarks seemed encouraging enough. But only two years later, in the winter of 1996, Israel was struck by a devastating wave of similar bombings that claimed the lives of some 60 civilians within the span of a few days. Buckling under Israeli and international pressures, Arafat took a series of steps against Palestinian radicals opposed to peaceful co-existence with Israel.

Those of us who supported Oslo as a pathway to a historic Israeli rapprochement with the Palestinians viewed Arafat's belated moves with a measure of hope. Yet, much to our disappointment, our hopes would be constantly dashed.

We – Israelis and Diaspora Jews alike – bitterly learned that Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority and chair of the PLO, regarded violence as a legitimate extension of Palestinian diplomacy. It obviously did not matter to him that violence was an egregious breach of the Oslo accords.

Certainly, the Palestinians harboured just grievances. Jewish settlements in the territories were growing exponentially. Closures and road blocks were hampering freedom of movement and battering the fledgling Palestinian economy. And, at the bottom of it all, Israel's occupation of the territories had still not ended (Israel controls, fully or partially, 82 per cent of the West Bank).

At Camp David and later in Taba, the Palestinians were given a golden opportunity to shake off the occupation and grasp statehood. But instead of embracing these objectives, the Palestinian Authority instigated an uprising, now in its 16th month.

No less a personage than Hosni Mubarak, Egypt's president, has bewailed the Palestinians' short-sightedness. "Huge opportunities to resolve the conflict presented themselves and they were all lost," he declared last week, referring not only to Camp David and Taba but to previous chances at peacemaking in 1947 and 1967 spurned by the Palestinian leadership.

There is more. Almost two years ago, Ehud Barak, the then Israeli prime minister, agreed to withdraw from about 90 per cent of the West Bank and all of Gaza in exchange for an end-of-conflict pact. Encouraged by President Bill Clinton, he sweetened his offer at Taba. No Israel leader had ever offered the Palestinians so generous a deal.

The Palestinians balked, claiming the offer was badly flawed. They wanted sovereignty over the Temple Mount in eastern Jerusalem. And they could not accept Barak's apparent vision of a Palestinian state, carved into three distinct cantons and thus lacking territorial contiguity and viability.

Yet, in the opinion of many analysts, the deal breaker was the Palestinian refugee issue. Arafat demanded that millions of refugees be allowed to go back to their former homes in what is now Israel. His demand for the "right of return," had it been implemented, would have completely altered Israel's Jewish character through incremental demographic means. It would have also made a sham of the much-debated two-state solution, the only possible basis of a peaceful resolution of the Arab-Israeli dispute. In other words, Arafat's troubling insistence on the "right of return" called into question his very acceptance of Israel's existence as a Jewish/Zionist state.

Arafat's harsh reaction to Israel's offer – which Barak suspended after calling a general election – might have been seen as a tough negotiating tactic had he come up with a counter offer. But instead of patiently working with Barak and Clinton to achieve a breakthrough, Arafat opted for armed struggle, which he had promised to abandon. No wonder Israel is so disillusioned with him.

Last December, after Hamas suicide bombers killed 26 civilians in Jerusalem and Haifa and a further 10 Israelis near the West Bank settlement of Emmanuel, the United States and the European Union prevailed upon Arafat to call a halt to what he himself described as all "terrorist activities."

Yasser Arafat

During the subsequent lull, the West Bank and Gaza were relatively quiet, although Israel continued to carry out pre-emptive operations aimed at Palestinian militants who had either slain or were planning to kill Israelis.

Hamas broke the lull on Jan. 9 by shooting dead four Israeli soldiers in Gaza. Israel retaliated on Jan. 14 by taking out Raed Karmi, a leader of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, which is affiliated with Arafat's Fatah movement. Three days later, a gunman from that group killed six Israelis in Hadera.

This atrocity prompted Israel to further clamp down on Arafat – with whom Prime Minister Ariel Sharon severed ties and declared "irrelevant" late last year – and to briefly reoccupy the Palestinian town of Tulkarem in Area A, under the administration of the Palestinian Authority.

But in the eyes of the Israeli government, the Karine-A affair, in early January, was the defining moment, the event that exposed Arafat's true intentions. Loaded with 50 tons of weapons, including rockets, munitions and explosives largely purchased from Iran, Israel's arch enemy, the Karine-A was intercepted in the Red Sea by Israeli commandos, the second Palestinian vessel to be captured since May.

Bound for Gaza, the ship was piloted by a Palestinian Authority captain. It would strain plausibility to believe that Arafat, as he heatedly claims, was unaware of the shipment. Clearly, the weaponry was meant to bolster the Palestinian Authority's armoury in anticipation of a protracted military confrontation with Israel.

In response to these and other events, Israel, in repeated incursions into Area A, has continued to chip away at symbols of Palestinian sovereignty. Israeli helicopters have bombed Arafat's fleet of helicopters, leaving him stranded in Ramallah, torn up the runway of his airport in Gaza and strafed his police buildings. In addition, F-16s have levelled a variety of other Palestinian installations and bases, and tanks have enforced the current blockade of Arafat's compound in Ramallah. Sharon has said the siege will not be lifted until Arafat extradites the killers of Rechavam Ze'evi, the minister of tourism who was assassinated last October.

Facing the dreary prospect of an insufferably long Israeli siege, and having been accused of tolerating and enhancing terror by Washington, Arafat finds himself in dire straits, shunned by Sharon and President George Bush, both of whom have refused to meet him. Last week, in a meeting with Bush at the White House, Sharon urged him to abide by his boycott of Arafat.

The isolation into which Arafat has been thrust is serious, but he has weathered crises in the past: Jordan in 1971, Beirut in 1982, the Bekaa Valley in Lebanon in 1983 and the Gulf War in 1991.

Cognizant of his low-ebb status, Arafat, a master of half-measures and half-truths, has launched a public relations campaign to rehabilitate himself. In a recent op-ed piece in The New York Times, he condemned attacks against Israeli civilians, reiterated his support of a two-state solution and, for the first time, voiced understanding of Israel's "demographic concerns" with respect to the "right of return." Yet Arafat, who has detained 195 militants and placed Hamas' leader under house arrest in recent weeks, has yet to conclusively prove his sincerity as a fighter of terrorism.

In self-defence, Arafat claims he cannot combat terrorism, or end the intifadah, without concrete and significant political concessions from Israel. There is some merit in this point, as Foreign Minister Shimon Peres has observed. And the fact that Sharon – an ardent opponent of Oslo – is unwilling to concede more than 42 per cent of the West Bank (or about 10 per cent of Mandate Palestine) as part of a final agreement is also extremely problematic.

At the end of the day, however, Arafat needs to demonstrate that he is prepared to smash the terrorist infrastructure in the interests of peace. As U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell has said, Arafat must choose between peace and terror. If he remains idle, he cannot be considered a true partner in peace. And if he lacks the courage and strength to confront "the enemies of peace," as he put it eight years ago, he should step aside and let history take its course.

Maintaining Jewish ethics in business not complicated, panel says

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Maintaining one's Jewish ethical principles in the business world is not as complicated as it might appear, according to members of a recent panel on Money, Morality and the Marketplace.

The event was sponsored by Beth Jacob v'Anshei Dridz Congregation, where the panel was held, the Jerusalem College of Technology and the University of Waterloo Jewish studies program.

Panelists were Rabbi Asher Meir, research director, Jerusalem College of Technology Centre for Business Ethics; Rabbi David Lapin, president, Strategic Business Ethics Inc. in Los Angeles and founder of the South African Institute of Business Ethics; and Mark Schwartz, lecturer on business ethics at the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania.

The discussion focused on the issue of whistle-blowing, that is, making wrongdoing known, inside or outside an organization.

Basically, Rabbi Meir said, according to Jewish thought, one shouldn't be a talebearer – even when the tale is true. This is contrary to the secular notion that truth is an absolute defence in cases of slander. Jewish law says one must not insult, cause damage or embarrass someone.

This is also, he said, contrary to the media imperative of "the right to know."

Jews are supposed to see the good in people, and assume that even if someone did something wrong, it was probably a temporary lapse and he or she is repentant.

In order to make whistle-blowing acceptable, the rabbi said, five conditions must apply. First, one must be absolutely convinced that the story is true and not merely supposition. Then, the issue must not be exaggerated. In other words, to stay a person stole something is not the same thing as calling him a persistent thief.

The intention must be to provide an obvious benefit, rather than being self-serving or acting out of vindictiveness.

Also, it must be impossible to achieve that benefit by any other means.

Finally, when one does decide to take action, it should not cause unnecessary suffering. The person may deserve to be censured, but not wind up being fired.

Another business technique that is forbidden according to Jewish law is insulting the competition.

One can never compare one's own service with that of the competition or use derogatory statements, Rabbi Meir said.

One must speak objectively, he explained. One may say, for instance, that the car one is selling has fewer kilometres on it or gets more miles per gallon than someone else's, or that a microprocessor offers greater speed at a better price, but one may not say anything derogatory about the other person.

Work evaluations are another touchy issue. If the supervisor has a clear knowledge of an employee's shortcomings, he is allowed to pass that on. However, he must refrain from conjecture. Rabbi Meir questioned the increasingly common practice of peer evaluation, fearing that it has a great potential for vindictiveness.

One must beware when writing letters of recommendation. "You have to make sure that the information reaches the employer, and not, for instance, a credit company, a shadchan or a busybody."

Rabbi Lapin warned of the danger of "Jewish business ethicists becoming self-righteous moralists." That's why whistle-blowers are treated so badly, he said.

All cultures and people with all levels of education have an innate knowledge of right and wrong, he insisted. The issue, Rabbi Lapin said, is "can we get people to do what's right, even if the cost is high." That will happen if people believe in the purpose of what they are doing, he said.

Jewish theology does not consider business to be intrinsically evil, since, like everything else in the world, it was created by God. It must, however, be carried out with a desire to provide goods and services that are genuinely needed, and in a moral and ethical way.

"We must focus on how to do what is right, not how to stop what is being done wrong," he said.

Rabbi Jay Kelman, rabbi of Beth Jacob and co-chair of the evening along with Jim Diamond of the Jewish studies department of the University of Waterloo, said the purpose of programs such as this is to generate interest in business ethics.

"I would like to create a culture in which such issues are important," Rabbi Kelman said.

To that end, he said, he wants to start an institute of business ethics, which will offer programs on the topic, as well as a newsletter.

Peace not on the horizon, says leading analyst

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prof. Efraim Inbar doesn't come right out and say, "I told you so" when asked about the state of Israeli-Palestinian relations.

Although he was always a skeptic when it came to the Oslo peace process, he acknowledged it had a tremendous allure – an almost hypnotic, drug-like affect on many Israelis.

"It opened a new age where peace might be possible," he said. "It was a powerful message. We are suckers for peace. Basically, [Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser] Arafat brought them back to reality.

"Israelis were on a peace trip for several years. Now is the cold turkey period, and it's not easy."

As director of the BESA Centre for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University, a think tank created with the support of Montrealer Tom Hecht, Inbar's job is to keep tabs on developments in the region that affect Israel.

His focus in recent years has been Israel's strategic alliance with Turkey and the emerging relationship with India, but it has been impossible to ignore the conflict in his front yard. Based on his analysis of the nature of the Palestinian national movement and its leadership under Arafat, Inbar is not optimistic that a solution will present itself anytime soon. There's plenty of stomach for a fight on both sides, and the conflict promises to continue into the foreseeable future.

"My main message is that there are situations in life where there is no solution," he said. "Israelis have learned to live with low intensity conflict. We have the upper hand in the conflict with the Palestinians."

Instead of expecting to solve the conflict, "we should focus on managing it."

Inbar presented his analysis of the current situation in a recent series of lectures and meetings in Toronto, Hamilton and London.

As he describes it, the Palestinians made the decision to ratchet up the level of violence 1½ years before the intifadah actually broke out. Israeli intelligence reported that finding to then-prime minister Ehud Barak, but he "refused to act on it," Inbar said.

"He was engaged in wishful thinking. Peace is a nice dream. Sometimes you don't want to hear bad news. It's only human."

For Arafat, violence – the modus operandi of the Palestinian nationalist movement – held out the promise of coercing greater concessions from Barak as well as the chance of "internationalizing" the conflict by bringing in outside forces, Inbar said.

Palestinians have always maintained a "detonator theory" in which their conflict with Israel would spill over into neighbouring Arab countries, he said, but neither Jordan nor Egypt is interested in fighting Israel on behalf of the Palestinians.

Arafat has succeeded in alienating his American interlocutors, who are fed up with his lies and are concerned that he turned to fundamentalist Iran to stock a freighter with arms that promised to escalate the conflict to new levels, Inbar said.

Given that Arafat has been courting the United States, the move is inexplicable, he said, except that "people do stupid things. He [Arafat] didn't think about all the consequences."

Looking farther afield, Inbar, who recently published The Israeli-Turkish Entente, said the two states are moving closer on a number of fronts.

Their strategic relationship finds Israel and Turkey sharing intelligence, strengthening their ties to the United States and engaging in trade (Israel sells weapons to Turkey). Israel also wields what influence it has in Washington to promote Turkish interests, while Turkey permits Israeli military aircraft to operate from its eastern bases, sending an important deterrent message to Syria, Iran and Iraq, he said.

The countries share common problems as well. Both are beset by Islamic radicalism, both face threats from neighbours armed with weapons of mass destruction, both are suspicious of Russian attempts to return to the region, both want to reduce Russian and Iranian influence in Central Asia and both have problematic relations with Europe.

Inbar, who was born in Romania and who emigrated to Israel as a boy, is also involved in informal meetings with Indian colleagues.

As with Turkey, India and Israel share interests and concerns. India also faces Islamic radicalism and terror and the two countries share intelligence in that regard.

Israel is also helping the Indian military upgrade its Soviet-era equipment and sells it new weapons (India is interested in the Arrow anti-missile system, a joint U.S.-Israel project). In addition, India offers a market of 1 billion people for other Israeli goods. The joke in Israel is that between them, the two countries represent one-quarter of the world's population, Inbar said.

As India increasingly orients itself to the West and "grows out of this third world anti-American nareshkeit [silliness]," Israeli and Indian interests increasingly coincide.

By PABLO FUCHS

TORONTO — Left-leaning post-Zionists are no different from right-wing revisionists, an Israeli professor said at a recent lecture at the University of Toronto.

While their political ideologies and motivations are totally opposite, "the end result of either movement's victory would be exactly the same: a pan-Semitic state that would benefit the elite in the Jewish community," said Eran Kaplan, the 2001-2002 Ray D. Wolfe Fellow at U of T.

Revisionist Zionism, Kaplan said, was started in the 1920s by Vladimir Jabotinsky. The movement was based on the notion that Jews could not wait around for the British to grant them a state in Palestine, but had to seize power themselves.

Jabotinsky and his followers believed the only way to establish an independent, Jewish state was through violence, said Kaplan, a 33-year-old native of Tel Aviv. They envisioned a state where both Arabs and Jews would live side by side under a European Jewish leadership.

The post-Zionists, who began to spread their message in the 1990s, are at the opposite end of the spectrum, Kaplan said. They believe that since Israel was created at the expense of the Palestinian people, Zionism is thus colonialist and racist and has exceeded its purpose. They wish "to remove Zionism as the main expression of Jewish identity and in its place, establish a secular state in modern Israel" where Jews, Arabs and any other inhabitants would live together in peace, Kaplan said. This would re-introduce the notion of the wandering Jew and would instil tradition and history as the main sources of Jewish identity.

So, how could these two opposing theories end up with the same result?

Although the processes would be different, Kaplan said, the result would still be a pan-Semitic state with Arabs and Jews living side by side, but both oppressed by the ruling majority, the Ashkenazi European Jews, who would control the country's capital much as they do today.

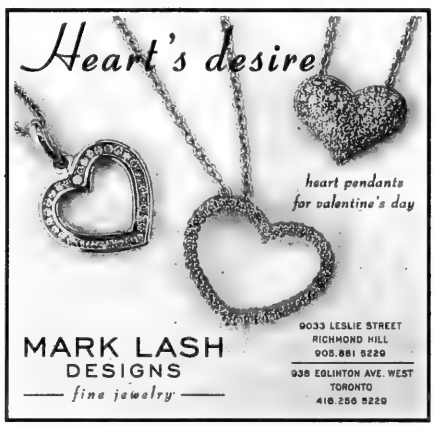
Since in either case the conditions of the working class would further deteriorate while the standing of the European elite would be enhanced, Kaplan said he considers them both to be on the right side of the political spectrum, although the post-Zionists' intentions are nothing of the sort.

The revisionist movement still exists in Israeli society today – the current right-of-centre party, the Likud, is a descendant. But post-Zionism, which has created ripples through Israeli society in the last decade, is a new political movement, Kaplan said.

Kaplan, who addresses these issues in his doctoral thesis, said this debate has all but disappeared in Israeli society in the last 16 months.

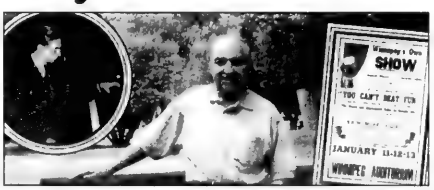
"As a result of the current intifadah, Israelis are more concerned about securing peace than discussing the state of their political existence."

But, he said, as soon as the political situation with the Palestinians is somewhat resolved, debates of internal issues will surely once again dominate the Israeli political landscape.



Musical comedy, teenage dreams are revived after 60 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter



Sam Seetner is seen on campus last summer and (inset) rehearsing for original production.

TORONTO — Sam Seetner, a retired Toronto dentist, is reviving a dream he had as a teenage playwright at the University of Manitoba.

More than 60 years after his original musical comedy, You Can't Beat Fun, premiered at U of M, the satire of university life will be running again as part of the school's 125th anniversary celebrations.

Seetner, a Winnipeg native, collaborated with librettist Earle Beattie on the show's 18 original songs. Billed as the "slaphappiest satire on campus life," it opened in 1940 to rave reviews and sell-out crowds, and had a hold-over performance at the Winnipeg Auditorium.

Seetner says that as a youngster, he had had dreams of becoming a musician, but "my father encouraged me to be practical and become a dentist. My musical career came to a halt when I entered dentistry school."

He says he is thrilled the university chose to remount his play, which will have a cast of 80 plus a chorus. "My dream is to see it on Broadway. This could be start of something very big."

The first run of the play starred such people as Let's Make a Deal host Monte Hall; Morley Margolis who went on to become an opera singer under the name Morley Meredith; and Monte Syme, now a Detroit rabbi known as Rabbi Robert Syme.

About a year ago, Seetner, who has not written anything since, donated the rights to the play to the university.

"Coincidentally, it was at a time when the school was planning its anniversary, and they decided to include it as part of their celebrations."

Paul Paterson, a professor at U of M's school of music and producer of the current version of You Can't Beat Fun, says the stars of this play are following in great footsteps.

"The school of music does not usually do musical comedy, so this is a chance to be involved in an energetic, upbeat show, one that promises to be as amazingly hilarious and incredibly delirious as the original."

Seetner plans to travel to Winnipeg with 11 family members for the Feb. 20 opening of the play, to be held at the Walker Theatre.

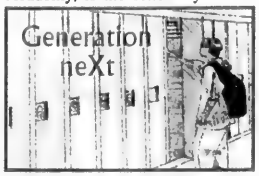
Knowledge for knowledge's sake

By JASON ROTSTEIN, MARK DANIELS AND LIOR BRAUNSTEIN

After obsessing over exams for weeks, we feel the need to gain some peace of mind concerning the focus of education. When Plato made the effort to establish the Academy, is the school system of today what he had in mind?



In our hearts, it is knowledge that we yearn for, not a meaningless number assigned to our grades or high school experience. The process of learning and education cannot be measured on a simple scale of letters. Unfortunately, we have little time to contemplate our present predicament. As students, we are bogged down with work and lack the luxury of having unlimited time to broaden our horizons. Sadly, many of us abandon all pretense of pursuing knowledge for knowledge's sake.

Throughout our high school career, we seek moments of inspiration that might orient and direct us. It is this very inspiration that governs us and motivates us to excel.

However, the value of our education gets hidden behind all the attempts by the government to reform school practices. Often, its priorities overshadow the needs of the voracious mind for constant inquiry and exploration. Those long hours spent poring over textbooks and problem sets will only pay off in the real world if we assert our individual commitment to knowledge.

To date, much has been said about Ontario's new four-year curriculum. Many educators are recommending an additional year in which to complete the required credits. Unfortunately, for many students, this suggestion would merely become an excuse for indolence. With globalization exerting its influence in Canadian politics, it is knowledge, above all else, that we must prudently preserve.

When we began high school, we treated it as just another step to something better. We were encouraged to complete the necessary credits that would afford us a position in the world of tomorrow. Yet, as we approach our destination, we realize the purpose of the work and the dedication required to complete it far exceed the weight of a simple "admission slip" to university. The gestalt of our high school experience, far greater than the sum total of our credits combined, is the joy and appreciation of knowledge.

The democracy we find ourselves in as citizens prizes a diversity of ideas and opinions, those very same opinions we have been trained through our studies of Jewish morals and values to successfully impart to the world.

For centuries Jewish tradition has prided itself on hard work and motivation to survive against all odds. We cannot forsake the community ethos that has enabled us to become an am sgulah – a chosen people. Let us continue to embrace this tradition.

The authors are students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. They plan to graduate this spring.

Only El Al

By RABBI YEHIEL BENAYON

Through A Sephardi Window

There is a constant state of excitement in an airport, people coming and going, greeting each other or taking leave. Today I, too, am a part of this excitement. I'm standing in the long cordoned line, waiting to check in.

Directly in front of me is an old acquaintance, now a school principal in Israel. He is returning after a tour of recruitment. There, by the side, I see a striking young Russian couple. I recognize them right away; I had just married them a few weeks ago. They are here to see their grandmother off.

Evidently, there is a mission on this flight. Lots of mostly middle-aged men are talking to each other. Each, it seems, has found the solution for the conflict in the Middle East and are taking this with them to Israel.

Two sisters join the line; their father has passed away. The funeral could not wait, but they wish to sit shivah as a family nevertheless. I offer them my condolences.

A young man stands not too far away. I later learn that he is a Canadian boy who has volunteered in the Israeli Defence Force. After boot camp, his parents brought him home. Now he is returning for the remaining 18 months. Both parents watch with much pride and concern; the father holds back the tears but the mother cannot.

More students are off to their studies in Israel. Entire families see them off. All around me more people, each I am sure with their own story.

It is my turn at the security check. "Your ticket and passport, please. Where do you live?" the young man asks. I grin incredulously. Doesn't he remember greeting me yesterday on Shabbat in the synagogue? He smiles back but continues his questions... Did you pack your own bags...

On board, I find the plane is already quite full with passengers. It seems this flight originated from the American West Coast and the passengers are all as eager to get to Israel as I am. The announcements begin, in Hebrew, of course, and right away, I am home. You see, my days in Israel are as precious as they are few; with El Al, the trip itself is very much a part of the wonderful experience, for it all starts as soon as you get on board. Where else can you get a minyan over the Atlantic Ocean or tune in your headset to a Torah lesson or Jewish/Israeli music?

But these are not the only reasons I fly El Al. Perhaps it is also because El Al is the national carrier of Israel. Maybe too, because El Al, out of respect to Jewish tradition, grounds its entire fleet of planes for the Sabbath. Possibly, as well, because the very week I was flying, an El Al plane flew to Lithuania in order to return to the Jewish people hundreds of centuries-old scrolls that had been stolen by the Nazis. Probably also, because in 1990, during one of the great moments of the century, Operation Moses, El Al planes and pilots evacuated 18,000 Jews out of Ethiopia in less than 24 hours. And, every time there is a regional conflict and other airlines quickly suspend their flights, only El Al loyally maintains its schedule.

But, almost certainly, it was that middle-of-the-night experience in the '80s as we, a few dozen North American rabbis stood on a windy runway of Ben-Gurion Airport, waiting to welcome one of the first planeloads of Russian immigrants. From the heavens came this massive machine, one that roared to a deafening stop before us, and out from it came a prophecy about a people and a promised land. That machine bore the star and colours of Israel and the letters El Al. Yes, certainly it was that moment, when our bones turned to jelly and we wept uncontrollably, that I decided that I would only fly El Al.

The Canary Island Inquisition

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

Back about 1890, Anglo-Jewish historian Lucien Wolf noted a curious fact: several of the first Jews to settle in London after the Jews were re-admitted into England in 1655 had "hailed from a little archipelago in the east Atlantic, which had never before figured in Jewish history, and which, so far as I know, has not even yet found a place in that record."

Intrigued by this significant historical puzzle, Wolf planned to visit the Canary Islands in 1894 but cancelled his trip when, by a fortuitous coincidence, he found that the English Marquess of Bute had acquired 76 volumes of the very papers that he was determined to see.

The records of the Canariote Inquisition provide a gold mine of details about the small, obscure community of crypto-Jews, never numbering more than 400, that had been persecuted by the Catholic Church for three centuries. Essentially, the records document the Church's attempt to seek out secret Jews, sorcerers and other heretics in the Canary Islands between 1499 and 1818.

Wolf studied the papers meticulously for three decades, eventually extracting the Jewish cases and publishing them in English translation with a luminous scholarly introduction. The book, Jews in the Canary Islands, appeared under the auspices of the Jewish Historical Society of England in 1926. Recently, the University of Toronto Press republished it as part of a series of rare and worthy historical reprints.

As Wolf explains, the records offer a lurid chronicle of the Inquisition's iron grip on the so-called "New Christians" who practised Judaism in secret. Many had escaped to these remote islands from Spain and Portugal after 1492, but some, including a family named Beltran, had arrived in the 1480s or earlier.

Up to 1505, and for intermittent periods thereafter, the Conversos on the Canaries had "easily relapsed into their old Jewish life," Wolf writes. They prospered as merchants, professionals, landowners, silversmiths, butchers and other tradesmen.

But when the anti-Jewish mania reached hysterical pitch, a wave of denunciations led to arrests, torture, trials and autos-da-fé in which Jews were burned alive, often on the most flimsy evidence imaginable. In 1506, for example, one Marcos Goncales was denounced for washing shirts on Saturday night and hanging them out to dry on Sunday morning. Children confessed under torture that their parents spoke Hebrew and did not cross themselves in prayer.

Ship captains were warned, upon penalty of excommunication and loss of their ships, not to give passage to the heretics: the Church wanted them destroyed. Even so, many managed to flee to Madeira, Flanders, the West Indies and even Palestine (1524).

In 1662, a long series of denunciations by Gaspar de Perera provided "a remarkably vivid picture of Marrano life" throughout western Europe, Wolf relates. An "alleged Judaiser," de Perera provided more than 20 "spy" reports on the London Jewish community, naming officials and describing "their social life, their political status, and even their personal appearance." He also named the founders of Dublin's Jewish community, who are otherwise unknown to historians.

It is, perhaps, a classic case of something good coming out of something bad. Wolf laments that an even more detailed set of records, known as Causas, was destroyed "during the popular rejoicings" when Spain's Inquisitorial Office finally shut down in 1818: the Causas contained elaborate genealogical evidence that had been gathered for many crypto-Jewish prisoners, as well as verbatim transcripts of their cross-examinations and trials.

Still, for all it does contain, The Jews in the Canary Islands is a remarkable historical document. Seventy-five years after the book's first appearance, the U of T Press deserves praise for making it accessible again.

Potok's stories remain etched in the mind

Old Men at Midnight*, by Chaim Potok, Alfred A. Knopf, 2001.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Chaim Potok is among the most popular of American Jewish writers. His first novel, The Chosen (1967), its sequel The Promise (1969) and My Name is Asher Lev (1972) established his reputation as a thoughtful and provocative portrayer of the joys and sorrows of traditional Judaism's encounter with western secularism.

Conflicted characters are at the core of Potok's books. Reared in an atmosphere of piety and Orthodoxy, they yearn for a more inclusive, warm and inviting Judaism, with more positive attitudes toward the creative and healing aspects of art, music and literature.

Shining through all of Potok's books are an emphasis on Jewish scholarship, rich portrayals of Jewish family life and faith in humankind's ability to ultimately overcome formidable problems.

Old Men at Midnight consists of three dramatic novellas, set in America, Europe and the Soviet Union, that span the 20th century. They are held together by the presence of Davita Dinn, the protagonist of Potok's earlier novel, Davita's Harp (1985), who listens sympathetically as the three major figures in the disparate stories relate salient episodes from their lives.

In the first story, The Ark Builder, set in Brooklyn in the summer of 1947, 18-year-old Davita offers English lessons to a young student who spent three years in a German slave labour camp. He is the sole survivor of a Polish town with a once-thriving Jewish community. She gradually learns about the destruction of his town, and especially of the synagogue's ark, which had been lovingly rebuilt as a symbol of communal hope by the boy's martyred teacher.

Ten years later in The War Doctor, Davita, now a graduate student, meets Leon Shertov, a one-time Soviet officer and official of the KGB who defects to the West. During World War I, Leon's arm was saved from amputation by a Jewish Soviet army surgeon.

Years later, Leon again encounters the doctor, who is implicated in the so-called "doctors' plot," the infamous scheme invented by Stalin to foment anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union. Although Shertov can't save the doctor's life, he himself undergoes a spiritual transformation – once again, the result of the doctor's inspiration and faith.

In the final episode, The Trope Teacher, Davita, now a well-known novelist, comes to the aid of a distinguished historian and philosopher, who is suffering from a memory block while trying to complete his memoirs. Out of his regained recollections emerges the figure of a Polish émigré, a Mr. Zapiski, who, unable to eke out a living in America, insists upon returning to Poland, which is about to be invaded by Nazi Germany.

Zapiski is described in this manner: "And why did he walk moving his left foot forward in a shuffle and his right foot trailing? Shuffle and scrape, shuffle and scrape, an awkward drag-footed gait. A small, bumbling, stooped man who wore his hat low over his eyes and his jacket or coat collar up, his neck squeezed into his shoulders, looking to all intents and purposes like a turtle in the act of withdrawing into its shell. He had a habit of shaking his head in a sort of nervous twitch, jerking it from side to side, as if trying to disentangle himself from some web in which he had been caught."

Carefully and skilfully crafted, compelling and poignant, these stories remain etched in the consciousness.

Mishloach manot, part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The ninth chapter, verse 19, of the Book of Esther states: "Therefore the Jews of the villages, that dwelt in the unwalled towns, made the 14th day of the month of Adar a day of gladness and feasting, a holiday, and of sending portions to one another" [http://www.breslov.com/ref/Esther9.htm #19].

That's why this Feb. 26, thousands of years after the Book of Esther was written, Jews around the world will be scurrying from doorstep to doorstep depositing baskets laden with goodies at the homes of friends and strangers, too. Today, a look on the World Wide Web at one of the most delightful customs in the Jewish calendar: mishloach manot.

Why does the megillah command us to perform this mitzvah? Surprisingly, one source of this tradition is traced to the evil Haman. As Rabbi Yehudah Prero says on the torah.org site, "Haman described the nation of Israel to Achashverosh as a 'people scattered abroad and dispersed amongst the people.' Some commentators explain that Haman was pointing out that the Jewish nation was vulnerable because... there were disagreements and disputes among them so that in their hearts they were scattered and dispersed... To foster feelings of closeness, kinship, and love, we send gifts to each other on Purim" [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/purim/5757/vol2no29.html].

Rabbi Prero also says that we express our happiness on Purim through festive feasts that not everyone can afford. But because we do not want "to embarrass the poor, the rich give poor gifts, and the poor give gifts to the rich. All the members of the nation of Israel give indiscriminately to their brothers and sisters so all can celebrate Purim properly, without any shame" [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/purim/unity.htm].

It is hard to imagine, but the mitzvah of mishloach manot was practised during the horrors of the Warsaw Ghetto. From the writings of Hillel Zeitlin in 1942, we learn that Jews exchanged food during Purim in the ghetto. The article, "Solidarity and vitality during the Holocaust," says, "at the end, each Jew remained with the same meager quantity of food, but the fact that his poor meal represented the fulfillment of the mitzvah of 'mishloach manot' revived his soul, reinforced his inner strength and even aroused a feeling of song and joyousness within him" [http://www.pardes.org.il/articles/shoah.html].

Some of the truly moving stories of mishloach manot tell how a solitary bundle can change the lives of the recipient and the donor. In "Rediscovering Purim: A Bronx Tale," we meet Bernie, a man who lives in a run-down neighbourhood that had once been a thriving Jewish community. Through the delivery of mishloach manot, Bernie reconnects with traditions that had been forgotten years ago [http://www.jewishmag.com/41mag/bronxpurim/bronxpurim.htm].

Several sites go into great detail about how to perform the mitzvah properly. The L'Chaim site examines such issues as the proper time to deliver mishloach manot, the amount of food to be sent and the importance of using an agent to deliver the gift [http://www.lchaimweekly.org/cgi-bin/calendar?holiday=purim115]. The Darche Noam site looks at the custom through traditional sources such as the Gemarah and the Rambam [http://www.darchenoam.org/articles/web/holidays/ar_purim_mm.htm].

Although the megillah clearly states that we should exchange food on Purim, curiously, there is no blessing for the mitzvah. Rav Yechiel Weinberg comes to a lovely conclusion about this issue. If there were a blessing, it would have included the word v'tzivanu, "and He has commanded us." But it is preferable to give mishloach manot out of a love for your fellow Jew. If one gave because one was commanded to do so, the element of love would be lessened [http://www.aecom-shul.com/Torat_Shmuel/5758/tsTetzaveh.html].

In that light, Clal, the National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership, has created a prayer that can be recited as you are putting together your mishloach manot: "May I prepare and give these gifts with a full and open heart. May we be blessed on Purim and on each day of our lives with light, gladness and honour and with the gift to express our friendship" [http://www.clal.org/rl21.html].

Now that we know why we send mishloach manot, next week we'll see what should go into our gift boxes.

Noah Meltz: 'Short in height, great in stature'

By PAUL SOCKEN

Guest Voice

I am devastated at the loss of a true friend, an exemplary Jew and a magnificent human being.

Many people can give you anecdotes about the countless acts of personal kindness and exceptional generosity of spirit of Prof. Noah Meltz. Here's mine.

I came to him about 12 years ago, not long after we had met, to seek his advice. He spent a very long time examining every aspect of the issue I had asked him about and finally gave me his considered opinion. The next day, he called me and said that he had thought about the problem some more and wanted to add a further idea for me to consider.

That was Noah Meltz.

He cared deeply about the people who were fortunate enough to call him a friend. Their problems were his problems and he would not rest until he had done his utmost to assist those who came to him. He could give you nothing but his best. That was the mark of his friendship. That was the mark of the man.

Noah Meltz was short in height and great in stature. When former prime minister of England, Lloyd George, was met by a voter, she told him that she imagined him to be much taller.

The prime minister responded, "Madam, in Wales, where I come from, we measure a man from the neck up."

If that is the criterion for measurement, I would submit to you that Noah was a giant – a great mind and equally great in warmth and humanity.

For all of his very many achievements in the academy, from his Princeton PhD to his principal's position at Woodsworth College at the University of Toronto, it is his human qualities – his quiet dignity and self-effacing manner – that will remain with and inspire me.

He did not pursue honour, but was held in the highest esteem and was valued everywhere he went for what he had to offer and for who he was. He did not just worry and talk about Israel, he moved there and cast his lot with his people.

Noah Meltz was a great scholar and teacher. He taught by example. I learned by observing his conduct and listening to his words that integrity is real and need not be compromised; that a gentle, caring word and manner are possible in this otherwise hurried and insensitive world; that true yiddishkeit is not made up only of abstract principles or learned discourse or rituals but consists of concrete actions and reaching out in service and love in this broken world; that optimism is a powerful antidote to cynicism and despair; that each one of us can make an important difference; and that one person really is a whole world.

When Jews ask for long life, they ask for yirichas yomim, length of days, not years. Who wouldn't want a very long life if given the choice? But we are not given that choice. The only one we do have is to make the days we are allotted lengthy ones, filled with accomplishment and meaning. I cannot think of a single person who has fulfilled that call to yirichas yomim more than Noah Meltz.

He was the very embodiment of goodness, compassion, kindness and love for his family and friends and acquaintances. And, in the end, that is all we can really ask for.

When all is said and done, the world is a poorer place for its lack of Noah Meltz. He has done all that could have been asked of him and it is our sacred duty to honour his memory by following in his path and striving to achieve even a portion of his merit.

Paul Socken is a professor of French at the University of Waterloo.

Club Darwin meets after 47 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Memories of Club Darwin's first meeting in almost 47 years are bittersweet.

Less than a week after the October reunion, members learned that Jack Ugar, who travelled from California to attend, had died.

Irvin Harendorf, one of the original 18 members of the club which was formed at the Bloor YM & YWHA, said that an article in The CJN had triggered the reunion.

"Another club had recently met, and I thought we could do the same," Harendorf said. "Sixteen of us attended, some of whom had kept in contact over the years, but there were others we had not heard from in almost 40 years."

Ugar, who belonged to Club Darwin with his older brother, had been anxious to see the members again, said Harendorf. "We were devastated when we heard the news about his death."

In the '50s, Harendorf said, the Bloor Y was the meeting place for young Jewish teenagers. "We formed different clubs, and each club had an adviser who helped organize sports teams and social events.

"We grew up together. We never had to plan where we were going or what we were going to do. We had the Y. We practically lived there in our spare moments.

"Whether it was for a club meeting, a cultural event, a sporting event such as volleyball, basketball or floor hockey, or for dances in the lounge, it was a wonderful place to meet."

The club won several sports league championships, and in 1956 won the David Dublinsky Memorial Trophy, a special award that year that went to the most outstanding teen club at the Y, said Harendorf.

One of the boys' favourite endeavours, he said, was getting a driver's licence. "I don't know why. Few of us had any access to a car."

Harendorf often thought about the club over the years, he said. "I wondered what happened to some of the members. We just lost contact with some, and I never knew why.

"When I read about the other reunion, however, I decided to track everyone down. Imagine, everyone came but two people. We all had to same feelings about the time we had spent at the Y."

The club plans to make a donation to the Miles S. Nadal JCC in Ugar's name. "How ironic that the building where all of us spent most of our leisure, fun and sporting lives, should be undergoing a renovation at this time."

Club Darwin is planning another meeting for May or June 2002.

TJA OHR MENACHEM BAKE SALE: More than $550 was raised at a recent Toronto Jewish Academy Ohr Menachem bake sale in aid of a family who lost two parents and two children in a suicide-bombing at a Jerusalem pizza restaurant last year. The Grade 3 class, under the guidance of teacher Rivka Caro, baked and sold the cookies. The cheque was presented to Zale Newman (right), chair of the CK Fund, which raises money to help the family. Seen with Newman are, from left, Caro, school principal Henya Schechter and students Jonathan Kormendi and Netanel Saprikin.

TAU prof involved in space shuttle research

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Colin Price is a man who can make dust particles sound interesting.

The South African-born professor in the Tel Aviv University (TAU) department of geophysics and planetary sciences, who is currently on sabbatical at Environment Canada, spoke about the university's role in the upcoming 16-day space shuttle mission known as MEIDEX (Mediterranean Israeli Dust Experiment), at Canadian Friends of TAU's recent annual meeting.

The mission, scheduled for liftoff in June, was proposed by TAU's department of geophysics and planetary sciences, following a 1995 meeting between then-Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres and then-American president Bill Clinton, during which Clinton offered Israel the opportunity to have an Israeli astronaut on a U.S. space shuttle.

Colonel Ilan Ramon, an F16 pilot in the Israeli air force who is training for the mission at NASA and who will be Israel's first astronaut, is a TAU graduate, Price noted.

Ramon and his team will conduct studies on the characteristics of desert dust while in space. The significance of dust particles includes the role they play in rainfall generation and possibly in the earth's climate, said Price.

"On a more practical side," he noted, "they're important for aviation, not only [in terms of] visibility, but dust can get injected into engines of aircraft and cause a lot of damage."

The particles can also cross the ocean and affect its biology, he said. "A lot of the problems with coral reefs in the Caribbean are due to dust... from the African continent."

And why is Israel particularly suited to this type of study? Israel has "some huge dust storms," Price said. "We have many years of experience observing, and we have the equipment. We can contribute to this mission."

All data will be collected by ground stations and returned to TAU for analysis, he said.

In the event that there is no dust to be filmed, Price, whose area of expertise is the connection between lightning activity and the earth's climate, suggested looking at thunderstorms at night, and at sprites, a phenomenon discovered about 10 years ago and characterized by brief, low-intensity flashes of light above the level of the lightning. (Dust is visible only during the day.) "There are lots of thunderstorms, especially in the tropics," he said.

Allowing Shabbat ballot 'a mistake,' says Flaherty

elections provide for advance polls to avoid this kind of difficulty."

As he sees it, the best solution – "a total answer" – would be an advance poll with a preferential ballot, meaning a voter could pick more than one contender should voting go beyond one ballot.

But, he said, "I'm less concerned with the method at the end of the day than I am with making sure that no one is disenfranchised."

Would like to see advance polls

Flaherty believes the party can still be persuaded to allow advance polls, and says he's "going to continue to work on this to ensure that a solution is found."

He'll have to wait until Feb. 23, when the deadline for signing up new members passes. After that, "we'll be able to demonstrate objectively and factually to the executive the number of members who would be excluded and disenfranchised by the vote being confined to a Saturday," he said. "We'll be able to dramatize the issue and show them what the consequences are for members of our party. So I encourage people to become members, because it will make the submission all the more compelling."

Flaherty's team put out a press release last month, saying the party "has made it impossible for a large segment of Ontarians to participate in this important process. The executive of the party needs to rectify this oversight."

Jeff Bangs, executive director of the Ontario PC party, responded by accusing Flaherty of ignoring the party's provision for a proxy vote, and of trying to score political points with a constituency that has welcomed the Tories' Equity in Education Tax Credit for religious schools, which Flaherty has championed.

Flaherty declined to comment on Bangs' remark, stressing that while only a small minority of voters would be affected by the Saturday balloting, "if we believe in strength in diversity and an all-inclusive approach, then it's mandatory that we take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that no one is disenfranchised."

Asked whether he stands most to lose without the Jewish vote, he said, "That may be true. There's no question I was the architect of the tax credit, and [it] had certain support [among] people who believe in faith-based education in Ontario."

In January, party president Devlin indicated in a letter that the leadership steering committee lacked the authority to address the Sabbath voting issue, and Devlin asked whether the campaign wanted the issue addressed by the executive, to which Flaherty agreed.

Kolel sees attendance spike after Sept. 11

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Since Sept. 11, Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, has seen a 40 per cent increase in the number of students taking courses, says its executive director.

"People are feeling a need to reconnect with each other and with their background; they're changing the way they are looking at things," says Gail Gould.

"Many of us are feeling very insecure, largely due to what is happening in the world, and they want to cocoon in terms of exploring themselves. We [at Kolel] are trying to fill that need for self-exploration."

Along those lines, a group of young adults who met at a recent course on Jewish spirituality has gotten together to help Kolel plan programs relevant to them, Gould says.

"We did a survey to determine their cultural, social and religious needs and we plan on responding to those needs," she says.

"They are searching for a connection and we want to give them a safe, non-threatening environment in which to explore Judaism."

Through its courses, Gould says, Kolel attempts to create a community that invites members to experience, learn and understand traditional Jewish thought and practices, and apply them in the modern world.

"We also try to provide an accessible environment where members of the community can better understand and practise their Judaism," she says.

Courses this winter include Lamaze-l Tov, for expectant Jewish couples. This course examines anatomy and physiology, breathing and relaxation techniques, parenting skills, and discussions on such things as brit milah and baby-naming ceremonies, choosing Hebrew names, and the expectations of being Jewish parents.

Doing Jewish 1 is a class for those searching for an entry point to a modern and meaningful Jewish life, or for those who want to enhance their present Jewish observance.

At a weekly lunchtime gathering, participants will discuss the latest world issues, and by looking at Jewish texts they will try to discover a Jewish view of current events. Topics include war and retaliation, cloning and social welfare.

Other courses include Conversations About God, Women in the Tanach, Talmud for Dummies and Exploring the Zohar.

For information, call Kolel at 416-485-7007.

Citron gratified at tribunal's Zundel Website decision

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some time around 1978 or '79 – it was so long ago, she can't remember precisely when – Sabina Citron first heard about Ernst Zundel.

Citron was founder and spokesperson for the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association and at the time, the organization was being flooded with complaints from Jews and non-Jews alike about materials distributed by Zundel that whitewashed the Nazi regime.

Citron, who had been monitoring the local neo-Nazi scene for some time, was disgusted by what she saw.

"It was hate propaganda using Holocaust denial as a springboard to yet again assail Jews," she recalled.

Not being the retiring type, Citron and the CHRA launched a legal action against Zundel and in 1981 had his mailing privileges suspended.

Although the ban only lasted one year, it represented the first time she would confront Zundel in a legal arena. Two weeks ago may have marked the last. That's when a tribunal constituted under the Canadian Human Rights Act upheld a complaint brought by Citron and the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations that a Web site operated by Zundel offered materials likely to expose Jews to hatred or contempt.

The two-person tribunal ruled that articles downloaded from Zundel's Web site, which denied the Holocaust and which claimed Jews lied about it to extract reparations from Germany, did indeed violate the Canadian Human Rights Code.

"Based on our view that the Zundelsite materials characterize Jews as 'liars, cheats, criminals and thugs' who have deliberately engaged in a monumental fraud designed to extort funds, we regard it as highly likely that readers of these materials will, at a minimum, hold Jews in very low regard, viewing them either with contempt, scorn and disdain, or hatred, loathing and revulsion," the tribunal's decision stated.

Though the tribunal ordered Zundel to cease and desist from continuing to offer such material, Zundel had left Canada for Tennessee more than a year ago.

In a "ZGram" posted on the Web site under the name of Ingrid Rimland, Zundel's wife (the tribunal found Rimland took her marching orders from Zundel) states her husband "is utterly out of the Tribunal's jurisdiction and his detractors' clutches ..."

She goes on to call the decision a victory for censorship and the hearing "a legal lynching party."

For her part, Citron is gratified at the tribunal's findings, believing it contains an important educative component and sends a clear signal of what is unacceptable in Canadian society. As for Zundel, "I'm thrilled he isn't here. Good riddance. We didn't need him here in the first place."

Sabina Citron in 1988

Between the time she launched the first legal challenge to Zundel 20 years ago and the denouement of the Internet case two weeks ago, Citron also initiated a criminal case which attracted international attention.

In 1983, she charged the German-born propagandist with spreading "false news" in connection to his distribution of the Holocaust-denial pamphlet, Did Six Million Really Die? A second pamphlet, The West, War and Islam, which was aimed at a Muslim audience, was also the subject of the charges, but in a 1985 trial, the Crown did not pursue its prosecution with any vigour.

In two separate cases, a jury determined that Zundel knowingly spread lies about the Holocaust, but in 1992 the Supreme Court of Canada in a 4-3 decision overturned the false news law, saying its violations of free speech were not justifiable in a free and democratic society.

Unsuccessful attempts to convince the attorney general of Ontario to charge Zundel under federal hate propaganda law – which the High Court had upheld in the Keegstra case – left Citron frustrated and believing Canada was not serious about protecting all its minorities from vilification.

In the mid-1990s, a little before she raised the complaint about the Zundel Web site, she filed a civil action against him for defamation, claiming material on the Web called Holocaust survivors, and her specifically, liars.

That case is still on the books, but was not actively pursued while the human rights case was under adjudication, she said.

Citron is considering how actively she will continue with the case, and whether there is a way to enforce the tribunal's order against Zundel, given that he no longer resides in Canada. In the next few months, she will also see if she can convince the Web host for the Zundelsite to refuse service to their client.

Citron rejects critiques the high profile cases have provided Zundel, an obscure, marginal character beforehand, with tons of free publicity.

"The long struggle at least educated people," she retorted. "Zundel's name is dirt and no one would listen to him except the most hardened people or the young and naive.

"There is such a thing as bad publicity," she continued. "Bin Laden gets a lot of publicity, all of it bad. What does it prove?"

As for the future, Citron, a Holocaust survivor, plans to write a book about her wartime and post-war experiences.

Nevertheless, she admits to slowing down. "I'm not going to do this forever," she said. "I did my share for 35 years, now it's time for younger people to pursue this."

Bone marrow transplants often poorly understood

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of today's medical procedures that is arousing a great deal of interest – not to mention hope in those who need it – is the bone marrow transplant. However, in spite of newspaper articles, fictional (or fictionalized) television programs and much speculation, it is a poorly understood process.

Jay Feinberg knows all about it. In 1991, he was diagnosed with chronic myelogenous leukemia. His doctor assured him that his would be an easy death. Small comfort to a 22-year-old foreign exchange analyst just beginning his life.

His only hope, he was told, was a bone marrow transplant.

Bone marrow is a substance that is found in the hollow cavities of the body's large bones. Along with peripheral blood (the blood that is in the capillaries, veins and arteries), it is the best source of stem cells, the undifferentiated cells that can replace diseased cells.

As is the case with all transplants, the donor's blood must be compatible with the recipient's. The best chance is a close relative – a parent, child or sibling – or someone in the close family.

In Feinberg's case, his two older brothers were perfect matches for each other. But not for him.

The next best chance is someone from the same ethnic background – for Feinberg, an Ashkenazi Jew.

The Feinbergs decided to take a proactive approach. They began to organize mass screenings in Jewish communities in many countries, including the United States, Canada and Israel.

Torontonians and Montrealers may remember the screenings that were held for Feinberg in the early 1990s. More than 55,000 people were tested. When it appeared that only a partial match was available, Feinberg, whose condition was rapidly deteriorating, decided to go with that.

Then the miracle happened. A friend in Milwaukee decided to have one last drive, to help, if not Feinberg, then others. When the organizers were packing up, a young woman helping out decided to be tested – the last person. She was a match.

Feinberg, after a rocky first year, is now doing well and is symptom-free. He has devoted his life to educating and encouraging people to add themselves to bone marrow registries around the world.

At this point, he told The CJN in a recent telephone interview from the Florida offices of his organization, Gift of Life, there are about 3½ million people on various United States bone marrow registries, 100,000 in Israel, about 220,000 in Canada and 7½ million worldwide. There are also registries in Europe, Australia, South America and Asia, all linked by computer.

When a person is diagnosed with a disease requiring a bone marrow transplant, especially cancers of the blood and immune disorders, a search is done in all the registries; so it is entirely possible, as happened recently, that a person on the Gift of Life registry was discovered to be a match with a child in Italy.

Someone who is a match is brought into a local hospital. Under general anesthetic, a needle is inserted into the iliac crest in the lower back, and the marrow is extracted. There is some discomfort in the area for several days.

If peripheral blood is used, the donor is given the drug filgrastin, which stimulates the production of stem cells. The stem cells are then drawn out in a procedure similar to the harvesting of blood platelets. The drug causes flu-like symptoms.

The recipient, meanwhile, is put on a rigorous and often painful round of radiation and chemotherapy which eradicates his or her diseased immune system. The stem cells are given intravenously. They migrate through the circulatory system to the hollow cavities of the bones, where in a few weeks, they begin to manufacture healthy blood cells.

This does not mean that a patient is out of the woods. A very common side effect is graft-versus-host disease (GVH), where antibodies against the new marrow develop in the body. Feinberg explained that while one doesn't want too much GVH, a little bit seems to have an anti-leukemic effect.

"There are billions of leukemia cells, and the radiation and chemotherapy don't destroy all of them – it just takes a few to restore a full-scale case of leukemia."

GVH, in mild form, Feinberg said, kills those few remaining cells.

There is no cost for the searches, which are done by transplant co-ordinators in the patient's hospital. The costs of the donation and the transplant are born by the national health insurance plan (as in Canada) or by medical insurance companies. If the insurance company refuses to pay, there is usually money available either from individuals or through non-profit organizations such as Gift of Life.

A spokesperson for Canadian Blood Services, the institution that runs the blood system in Canada, including bone marrow transplants, said that the decision as to whether to use stem cells from bone marrow, peripheral blood, or the latest technology, umbilical cord blood, depends on the clinical situation of the patient.

Those who wish to be listed in the Canadian registry must be between 17 and 59, and in good health. One can register either by mail, telephone (in Toronto 416-974-9900) or at the Web site, www.bloodservices.ca.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am trying to lose weight. I find the hardest time of day is when I get home from work and I'm preparing dinner. I am starving and will grab the first thing I see. Do you have suggestions to help curb this hunger?

A. I have several suggestions. Make sure you eat protein at lunch. Also, in order to be less hungry in the late afternoon, have a planned snack around 4 p.m. or on the way home from work. Try yogurt, nuts, fruit, raw veggies, tomato juice or milk. If that fails and you still walk in the door starving, pour yourself a tomato juice, pull a bag of cut-up raw veggies out of the fridge or grab a piece of fruit. If you have a plan in your mind ahead of time, you're more likely to stick to it and less likely to grab the chips.

Q. I am noticing that organic foods are becoming much more available and "mainstream." I am wondering what your opinion of them is.

A. I am thrilled to see how many organic products are available in "regular" grocery stores today. I am a huge believer in eating as much organic food as possible. After all, if we have the option of buying equally nutritious foods that are free of often dangerous pesticides and chemicals, why not choose these? I am particularly fond of organic milk, eggs, grapes, raisins, strawberries, apples, orange juice, meat, chicken and soy products. I firmly believe that the fewer preservatives, chemicals and additives we put in our bodies the better, especially in our children's small bodies.

Jewish Campus Services 'seriously underfunded'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last year, Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) shocked some members of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's allocations committee when it sought a baseline budget increase of approximately $250,000.

Although the quarter-million dollar increase was not forthcoming, outgoing JCS president David Gotfrid, speaking at the organization's annual general meeting held at the Lipa Green building, expressed his pleasure over progress made in negotiating with the federation.

"It was acknowledged that the student population was seriously underfunded," he said, and grants were allocated "with the understanding that if the money, or some of the money, becomes available in the future, these grants will become part of our annual budget."

Staff salaries are the most seriously underfunded item, said Gotfrid, who has been succeeded by Larry Sonenberg. Less than two years ago, he noted, JCS received a one-time grant to "bump up" the salary levels, which he indicated were below the salary levels of colleagues in other local Jewish communal organizations. Part of last year's grants also went to maintaining salaries at the new levels.

"I think we really must continue to push to get the salaries up to the appropriate levels," he said. Gotfrid commended the calibre of the staff, but said that increased salaries are necessary to retain staff members and attract new ones with qualifications like degrees in Jewish communal service.

He also announced that construction on the long-awaited, new Jewish student centre on the outskirts of the University of Toronto's downtown campus is expected to begin in late spring or early summer.

The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, for which a ground-breaking was held in May 2000, will be located at the northwest corner of Huron Street and Harbord Avenue.

The organization has spent the better part of the last two years negotiating to obtain a second, adjacent lot, he said. "We're now looking at a 10-to-11,000-square-foot building."

Gotfrid charged student board members, four of whom are continuing on a one-year term, to look at their involvement with JCS as a "beginning. There are a lot of Jewish communal organizations that will be turning to you over the next 30 and 40 years to fill the roles on their boards and their executives."

Zac Kaye – executive director of JCS for the past seven years since its inception as the umbrella for Jewish student organizations on university and college campuses in Toronto – expressed gratification at the increased diversity and number of JCS programs as well as the diversity of its students, over the past years.

Among key areas of concern for the future, he noted, are Israel-related issues and the potential for anti-Semitism on campus. "We made a decision at Jewish Campus Services that a priority was the hiring of an Israel affairs co-ordinator, even if we didn't have the money."

Stuart Lapowich, who took on that role in November, is primarily responsible for pre- and post-Birthright programming for participants in the free 10-day Israel trip, and for creating a "pro-Israel agenda" on campus.

"The biggest single challenge, I believe, to Jewish students on campus is the lack of knowledge our students have in knowing what the case for Israel is all about and being able to articulate it clearly," said Kaye.

Students are deeply shocked at the passion and knowledge of others who challenge them on Israel-related issues, he added.

Funding an Israel affairs position is "probably the most vital educational initiative" JCS can undertake, Kaye stated. Among other initiatives he cited as necessary are the development of more opportunities for students to go to Israel, more seminars like the Israel Advocacy Weekend held this month, the development and nurturing of student leaders, and fund-raising for refurbishment of the JSF's quarters at York University.

SORORITY TORAHTHON: From left, Andrea Rafael, Cheryl Siegal, Simone Krasnov, Robin Epstein and Miriam Hambourg show off the challahs they made at an all-night Torahthon (study session), at York University. Epstein organized the program for the Jewish sorority Delta Pi. Speakers included rabbis Aubrey Glazer and Moshe Kirsh, Naomi Aram, Rachael Turkienicz and Susan Jackson, on topics including Kabbalah and Jewish identity. Money raised at the event will be given to Jewish Family & Child Service to help abused women.

Winnipeg's Russian Jews get a place of their own

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Russian Jewish community now has a place where members can feel at home when they are far from home.

Second Wind, which was formed last fall, has about 40 members and holds programs every month or so featuring Russian Jewish singers, and musicians and poets from Russia, Israel and North America.

"It's part of a circuit [these performers] are on," says president Igor Levin.

"There is a network of Russian clubs throughout North America including great clubs in Toronto and Montreal."

Levin, a computer technician who is originally from Rostov, estimates that Winnipeg's fast growing Russian Jewish population is well over 500.

He and his wife Elena, Second Wind's secretary, came to Manitoba nearly four years ago. They found they missed the rich cultural life they left behind in Russia.

He says that earlier attempts to form a club for Jews from the former Soviet Union did not work out.

The Levins helped start Second Wind with support from Jewish Child and Family Service who helps cover the cost of the club's events.

JCFS resettlement worker Rina Roytberg who emigrated from the former Soviet Union 13 years ago, books space for the club programs at the Asper Jewish Community Centre and helps publicize club activities.

The programs are publicized through Roytberg's Russian language column in the local Jewish Post and News, in a Russian-language radio show, on the club's Web site – www.russianwinnipeg.net – and by word of mouth.

Visiting entertainers are paid from membership dues and occasional fund-raising concerts featuring local Russian Jewish musicians.

Coming up for Second Wind are evenings with celebrated Russian Jewish poet Igor Guberman who lives in Israel, and poet Alexander Gorodnitskij. "It looks like we are going to have a busy year," Levin says.

Bombardier still bidding

Jillian MacCormack, speaking on behalf of Montreal-based SNC Lavalin, said "there is no mystery about it. We had to withdraw because there were a number of technical problems.

"We work in volatile regions around the world all the time. It's another thing when you are under constant direct fire from both sides all the time."

MacCormack said the threat of violence "made it unsure on the financial side. If you have a work stoppage if something is bombed, would we be compensated?"

Reports from Israel had erroneously indicated Bombardier, also based in Montreal, had pulled out of an international group of companies that was preparing to tender an offer on the construction of a Jerusalem commuter rail line that cut through areas acquired by Israel following the Six Day War in 1967.

Reuters news agency reported that pressure from Palestinian officials may have prompted Bombardier and SNC Lavalin to withdraw from competing consortiums bidding on the project.

In its report, Reuters cited an unnamed Israeli source involved in the project who blamed the Palestinian Authority for opposing it.

The unnamed source was quoted as saying Arab states still can exert pressure on outside firms considering business ventures in Israel.

But MacCormack rejected reports SNC Lavalin reacted to pressure from Palestinians. "We received absolutely no threats from the Palestinians," she said. "We had no contact with them at all."

Bombardier's spokesperson also rejected the idea that the company reacted to pressure from Palestinians. "Bombardier did not receive any calls or letters from the Palestinian government or any representative," Dufresne said.

The company's transportation division did send a letter to its representative in Israel, but the letter dealt with commercial issues related to the consortium's bid, she added.

Benjamin Noy, Israel's economic consul to Canada, also rejected suggestions that pressure from Palestinian sources could cause Canadian bidders to withdraw.

Companies considering ventures in Israel are motivated by business considerations, not political ones, he said.

Noy said there is no evidence of a resurgent Arab boycott similar to the one employed in the 1970s against companies doing business in Israel. Countries at peace with Israel – Jordan and Egypt – are precluded by terms of the treaties from participating in a boycott while Israel's immediate neighbours – Syria and Lebanon – don't have the economic clout to do so, he said.

Gulf states, he continued, "do what is profitable for them and I don't think the Gulf States will [revive] a significant boycott."

Bombardier, a world leader in rail car design and manufacturing, and SNC Lavalin were involved in competing bids on a multi-million project that would see construction of a 14-km light rail line in Jerusalem from Pisgat Ze'ev in the north via downtown to Mt. Herzl.

Figures for the value of the project vary. Reuters said the first phase was valued at $14 billion while Noy said $400 million US ($641 million CDN) was a more accurate figure. A press release issued by the Israeli ministry of finance in July 2001 put the figure at 1.7 billion Israeli shekels, which was worth $583 million (CDN) last week.

Noy said the light rail project is an important infrastructure investment that will benefit all Jerusalem residents, whether Jewish or Arab.

"It has to be viewed like any other infrastructure projects, roads or hospitals," Noy said. "Its goal is to improve the standard of living of all people who live in the area."

Arabs, he pointed out, make use of Israeli hospitals, travel to work in Israel and visit there. "This is going to better their situation and that of Jews who live in Jerusalem, so this has nothing to do with politics."

Noy said his inquiries from sources in Israel did not indicate there was any Palestinian pressure on consortium bidders. However, he said, the project was extremely complex.

The contract is for a BOT project: "Build, operate and transfer," he said. In addition to constructing the rail line and supplying the rolling stock, the consortium would be required to operate it for a time and eventually turn it over to Israel.

"That's a complicated project with risks," particularly if there are no government guarantees, Noy said. Participants might want to stay away rather than take on a risky venture, he added.

Bombardier has been involved in other projects in Israel, Dufresne said. It has already supplied 14 four-car double decker trains to the Israel railway authority, with options for 16 more four-car trains. The company is also considering bidding on a light rail project in Tel Aviv.

Young leadership awards presented

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The winners of two key awards for community volunteers are modest when it comes to their accomplishments.

Ivy Kopstein sees the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal's 2001 Max Nathanson Young Leadership Award as a reward for work she does because she enjoys it.

And Grant Zipursky, the recipient of the federation's Harry Silverberg Leadership Development Award for 2001, is surprised at receiving the honour.

The two annual awards recognize individuals in the community who are between the ages of 25 and 45 who have built up a track record of volunteer time in Federation/CJA activities and the community as a whole and show leadership potential.

Kopstein, a mother of two young children, began her volunteer activities with the Sara Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble. "Once I had my children, Elaine Goldstine (the CJA women's campaign director) decided I needed to be more involved in the community and got me started with the CJA," Kopstein says.

She started as a canvasser in 1996 and has since served on the budgets and allocations committee, the millenium committee and has been involved in the community's long term planning process. For the last three years, she has been a member of the women's campaign management team.

One accomplishment she is particularly proud of is co-founding the annual Family Matters program three years ago. The next Family Matters evening, she says, is being held in April in conjunction with a national Women's Leadership Conference.

In the larger Jewish community, Kopstein volunteers her time in the Shore Elementary school and serves on the boards of Shalom Residences (Winnipeg's equivalent of Toronto's Reena Foundation) and Camp Massad.

She is new to the Massad board. "My 10-year-old went to Massad for the first time last summer and loved it," she says.

Zipursky, a sales representative and father of two, was also first invited to become a CJA canvasser in 1996. For the past three years, he has chaired the $500 to $999 division and has trained other canvassers. This year, he joined the federation board.

"In this community, once you become involved, they really like to take you on," he says.

Zipursky is also co-president of his synagogue, the Chevra Mishnayes, and is a member of the Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate parent advisory committee.

"I have a strong sense of community," he says. "We need volunteers. I like to take an active role. The only way to be vocal is to be involved."

Zipursky and Kopstein will receive their awards at the community's annual Koved Evening at the end of May.

Stop funding PA, says Alliance's Stockwell Day

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Canadian government should cut all financial support to the Palestinian Authority until Yasser Arafat shows that he is serious about fighting terrorism, says Canadian Alliance leadership candidate Stockwell Day.

Speaking at Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron, Day said he finds it strange that a country that is so careful about hate speech is funding, through the Canadian International Development Agency, textbooks that "tell Palestinian children to hate Jews."

Furthermore, he asked, why is Canada is giving money to the Palestinian coast guard, which was caught smuggling arms intended for the PA, when Canada's own coast guard is under-funded?

He said Canada should also ban Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad from this country and shut down their "fund-raising fronts." Day said these groups support terrorism and build weapons of mass destruction intended for civilians.

"They have two main enemies: the United States, 'the Great Satan,' and Israel, 'the Little Satan.'"

Day spoke to about 65 people in his only public appearance during a one-day campaign swing through Montreal. His strongly pro-Israel talk drew some applause and a standing ovation at the end.

Referring to Arafat's recent article in the New York Times, Day said he doubts the Palestinian leader's sincerity in writing that he wants to stop terrorism and is opposed to the deliberate targeting of civilians as a means to advance the Palestinian cause.

"We've heard this from him before and seen precious little action. He has not arrested the assassins of cabinet minister Rehavam Ze'evi or the Karine A smugglers, who may be part of his own security apparatus.

"He allows Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad to openly operate in his own territory."

Day said Canada has not been strong enough in its condemnation of Palestinian terrorism. He is concerned that the Chrétien government is "losing its will" to stand by the United States and Israel in combating terrorism originating in the Islamic world.

"Canada must stand with the U.S. and Israel against this 'axis of evil,'" he said, using U.S. President George W. Bush's phrase. "We cannot be bystanders groping for a middle ground that does not exist," he stated. If the current war extends beyond Afghanistan, Canada should support it, he said.

Canada has an "unbalanced" policy on the Arab-Israeli conflict, he said, and should more closely follow U.S. policy, which is to either vote against or boycott anti-Israel United Nations resolutions or decisions taken by other international organizations.

Day thinks that new Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham holds some notions that will set Canada further apart from the United States. "He is in the mould of Lloyd Axworthy [a former foreign minister]. He has 'soft-power' ideas and is from the 'root causes' school that blames U.S. foreign policy or poverty in the Gaza Strip [for terrorism]."

Day said there should be no blurring between the "evil" of terrorism, which he defined as the deliberate targeting of civilians, which Israel has suffered, and "the tragic collateral damage in warfare.

"For a long time, reporting on that has not been directed in the manner it should," he said.

At the same time, Day said Israel should recognize Palestinian statehood, as long as all the Arab states recognize Israel. He referred to "Palestine" a couple of times in his speech.

He advised the Palestinians to use as their role models moderate Muslim countries like Turkey and to shun the paths of Iraq and Iran.

His appearance was chaired by the synagogue's spiritual leader, Rabbi Reuben Poupko, who said Day "deserves our hearing. He has eloquently defended Israel and the Jewish community when under assault, without regard for political gain.

"Stockwell Day says the same thing no matter what audience he addresses. What he says to us, he says to an Arab audience... He speaks the truth as he sees it."

Day reiterated his promise that he would support a federal tax credit for parents who send their children to religious schools.

Families who choose religious schools are "performing a public good" and that should be recognized, he said. He likened such a tax break to the one now given to parents who save for their children's university education.

CIC conference expected to draw hundreds

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Israeli President Moshe Katsav will be the guest of honour at the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) 17th Parliamentary Dinner and Policy Conference to be held in Ottawa on March 6.

Moshe Katsav

Although Parliament will not actually be sitting at the time, plans for the conference are well underway.

The event, expected to attract hundreds of participants from across Canada, had been planned before Parliament's schedule was changed.

"The community has told us that it needs a vehicle to give expression to their solidarity and support for Israel," said Shimon Fogel, CIC executive-director.

"What is driving us [in proceeding with plans for the conference] is the desire to provide a forum for people from across the country to come together and show that support... we decided to go ahead, regardless of how many parliamentarians attend."

This year's conference will be bigger than ever, combining three separate conferences to draw participants from all segments of the Jewish community.

On the day preceding the main event, 250 grassroots leaders will attend an advocacy training conference run by Local Israel Action Teams (LIAT), a network of over 30 groups set up across Canada over the past year to actively engage in pro-Israel grassroots activities.

"This will be a great opportunity for the groups to learn from each other. All the communities will benefit from the top-notch speakers we are bringing in," said Fogel.

On March 6, over 500 students from campuses across Canada will participate in their own student conference.

"Outstanding people are coming in from Israel and the United States to work with the students and to enable them to work more effectively on their campuses," said Fogel.

Workshops will look at such topics as the challenges students face with respect to Israel, dealing with Arab propoganda, and helping students feel more comfortable with their Jewishness in a sometimes unfriendly milieu.

The policy conference will offer a unique opportunity for the Canadian Jewish community to hear from Israelis representing the whole political spectrum.

Speakers will include Members of Knesset who will provide their perspectives on how they see Israel moving forward. Other speakers include Margaret Wente from The Globe and Mail; Alison Smith of CBC TV; Pierre Maisonneuve of Reseau de l'Information; and Martin Himel of Global TV News and the National Post.

Canada's new Minister of Foreign Affairs, Bill Graham, will speak at the luncheon. Keynote speaker at the Parliamentary dinner will be Prime Minister Jean Chrétien.

The CIC Parliamentary Dinner Web site is www.cicweb.ca. Information is also available by calling 613-234-8271.

Seniors enjoy tasty treats at Purim

By LINDA MOREL
Special to The CJN

People at the Hogar Hirsch home for seniors celebrate Purim every year, says Irene Lubasch de Munster, of Buenos Aires, who assists at the home and is a member of Hadassah.

She describes how elderly residents and their caregivers prepare for their annual Purim party, making posters and invitations and designing masks and costumes. They hire musicians and decorate the dining room. Several residents judge who's wearing the best costumes.

"Like every good Jewish festivity, the celebration ends with food," says Lubasch de Munster. "The most distinctive treats are, of course, hamantaschen."

This Purim, Hadassah, the international women's Zionist organization, is celebrating its 90th anniversary.

Active in more than 30 countries, Hadassah volunteers support two hospitals in Israel, medical research and Jewish education. They are advocates for women's rights, working tirelessly against domestic violence, and encourage women to vote on election day.

"I first learned about [mishloach manot] when I was 15 years old," says Terri Elbaum, a Hadassah volunteer from Los Angeles.

"Our rabbi's wife left a plate of Purim goodies on our doorstep. I never forgot this and knew someday I would prepare baskets for friends and family and secretly leave them on their doorsteps to find and enjoy."

Now a wife and mother, she bakes for Purim, no matter what.

Not long after an earthquake in 1994, Elbaum and her daughters turned out hamantashen by the dozen, surrounded by plastic drop cloths while workmen repaired the damage to her house.

Elbaum loves to bake and has invented original recipes, including chocolate and apple-nut fillings for hamantashen and her own chocolate chip mandelbread.

Esther Caplan, former regional president of Hadassah Pacific Northwest and current leadership development chair of the Seattle chapter, has fond memories of Foulare (pronounced Foo-lar-eh), pastry baskets filled with hard boiled eggs (see recipe below).

Caplan's recipe hails from her Turkish great-grandmother. She says the crisscross pieces of pastry covering the eggs to form the handles of the baskets symbolize Haman's incarceration. Baked with and without shoes or feet, baskets featuring these appendages are traditionally reserved for males.

Like the rest of the women in Caplan's family, though, her two daughters prefer the pastry to the eggs.

"As children, they wanted baskets with shoes because they offered more of the stuff they loved," she says. "To make the girls happy, my husband used to sneak them pastry shoes."

Several years ago, the Caplan family entertained a doctor who was visiting Seattle from one of Hadassah's hospitals in Israel. They took him to their Sephardi synagogue for festivities and to hear Megillat Esther.

"While he enjoyed celebrating Purim American style, the thing that really thrilled him was the Foulare," says Caplan.

From the other side of the world comes another family story and a recipe for Filled Raisin Cookies.

"I have been baking these cookies for so many years that I haven't thought about the story behind them in ages," says Claire Baer, a volunteer from Stony Brook, N.Y., who admits to learning how to make these "hidden hamantashen" from her mother-in-law 51 years ago.

The recipe originated with the great-grandmother of Baer's husband, who worked as a cook in a Christian household in Berlin. Every Purim, she not only baked filled raisin cookies for her family, but also for her employers.

Although they devoured them quickly, she never told the Christian family why she made them only once a year.

"These cookies once followed my daughter to college, and now her family looks forward at Purim to the large tin of cookies that I send them," says Baer. "My youngest granddaughter counts cookies and advises her family how many each person will receive."

Of course no recipe exchange at Purim would be complete without hamantashen, triangular cookies shaped like Haman's hat.

Years ago when Betsy Karpenkopf, daughter of a former Hadassah president, was in 11th grade, she studied Russian in a class taught by Mr. Renhack, a Catholic from Brooklyn.

"He was a portly man who loved food," Karpenkopf says, explaining that if any of his students arrived in class without their books or homework, the punishment was to bring baked goods the following day.

"Well, I forgot my homework one Purim, so I presented him with a plateful of hamantaschen made from my mother's recipe," Karpenkopf says. Mr. Renhack took one bite and said: "Mmm, cream cheese dough. That's not very traditional, is it?"

He was correct; cream cheese is an unusual ingredient in hamantaschen dough. However, foods with fillings follow a Purim tradition, symbolizing the story that unfolds.

IAF retaliates for killings; strikes at Gaza

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In the third reprisal air strike in less than a day, Israeli jets and helicopter gunships struck the main security complex in Palestinian-ruled Gaza City on Monday, sending clouds of smoke and debris over the horizon of the main urban hub of the Gaza Strip, witnesses said.

There were no immediate reports of casualties from the raid, which appeared to be the latest in a series of Israeli reprisals on Gaza after Palestinian shooting and rocket attacks in the Negev on Sunday.

IAF gunships hit the same area late Sunday, hours after two Palestinian gunmen sprayed gunfire at a café near an army base in Be'ersheva, killing two women soldiers before being shot dead themselves.

Palestinians also launched Kassam rockets at an unpopulated area of the Negev on Sunday. They caused neither damage nor injury, but represented a challenge to dire Israeli warnings of the consequences of such rocket fire.

Army Radio reported that security forces were investigating the possibility that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's ranch might have been the intended target of the rocket attack.

Palestinian hospital sources said three civilians and seven security forces were injured, none seriously, in the Sunday night raids on the compound. Helicopters also struck foundries in the northern Gaza Strip the army said were used to make munitions.

Meanwhile, IDF forces were prepared Monday for possible entry into Palestinian cities along the West Bank's Green Line border, in response to future firings of rockets from those areas, or as a preventative measure to head off such firings.

Israeli security sources said that the military response to Sunday's Be'ersheva terror shooting and to the firing of the rockets would be harsh, but would at this stage not include irreversible steps against the Palestinian Authority (PA).

"The operation must make this clear to the Palestinians: we will not abide turning rocket firings into a routine," a security source said. The IDF operation is expected to include taking over an area of territory under formal PA control, close to sites from which rockets have been fired.

IDF troops and tanks briefly raided the Palestinian-ruled West Bank city of Nablus early Monday, clashing with gunmen some 200 meters from the town's PA headquarters, in a response to terror attacks launched from the city. Palestinian security sources and witnesses said IDF tanks backed by helicopters entered Nablus from the east before dawn.

The IDF force withdrew a few hours after the raid began, witnesses said.

Sharon, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer met at Sharon's ranch in the western Negev overnight. The three decided to take harsh retaliatory measures in response to the rocket and continuing terror attacks. No details of the planned response were made public, and it was unclear if the Nablus action was discussed.

An IDF spokesman said infantry and engineering units operated in an area in the southeast of Nablus following attacks that had originated in the city and "in order to prevent further such attacks." He gave no further details.

Climbing Into History

Climb Masada at dawn before the Dead Sea sun scorches the mountaintop. You can almost hear the echoes of nearly 2,000 years ago when Elazar Ben Yair exhorted his followers to die resisting the Roman onslaught, ending the Jewish revolt against Roman religious persecution. The Jewish Zealots chose death at their own hands, making Masada, for many, a symbol of Jewish pride and courage.

Today, majestic Masada is the most popular tourist attraction in Israel outside Jerusalem. The former Judean desert fortress rises on its eastern slope, 450 metres above the Dead Sea, which is the lowest point on earth. Based on its striking natural beauty, Masada National Park was recently placed on the World Heritage Committee list of the most prestigious sites on earth. Here, you'll find buildings originally constructed by Herod the Great, implements used by the Zealots and the synagogue in which they prayed.

Masada National Park is open every day of the year, except Yom Kippur, from sunrise until one hour before sunset. The cable car operates from 8 am – 4 pm, but it shuts down earlier on Friday during the winter. There's a small entrance fee to this magnificent open museum of Jewish history.

And speaking of museums, in Israel there's virtually one on every corner. Keep your eye on Travel Israel next week.

Iran missile trial fails, casualties reported

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

A recent trial of the Iranian Shihab-3 missile failed when the engines exploded, reportedly causing a number of casualties. Experts say the repeated failures in the engines of the ground-to-ground missile will undoubtedly delay its production – but this doesn't mean Iran lacks operational missiles capable of reaching Israel.

Western sources say the failed trial took place three weeks ago, and for the first time, the blast claimed casualties and, according to one source, lives. No official Iranian announcement of the mishap has been made.

The first trial launch of the Shihab-3 took place in July 1998 and caught Israel and other countries by surprise. Iran said the launch was a success, but closer scrutiny suggested otherwise. The missile stayed airborne for about 100 seconds, then crashed. Experts said an engine problem caused the failure.

Iran also declared the second test-launch a success. It later emerged the Iranians had installed a North Korean engine in the missile, not an Iranian one. North Korean know-how has been instrumental in the development of the Shihab-3. But recent efforts to harness Russian expertise in dealing with the engine problems of the Iranian missile have failed to yield positive results.

Israel succeeded in convincing the United States of the need for a third deployed battery of Arrow anti-ballistic missiles to counter the Shihab-3, whose range is estimated at 1,300 kilometres.

Experts say the Shihab-3 failures will only delay the program. They note other countries are trying to develop ballistic missiles, suggesting it is only a matter of funds and time before one will be ready for production.

Another possibility is that if Iran seeks to have the Shihab-3 ready for deployment, it may choose to use the more reliable North Korean engines. North Korea also provides missile technology to Syria and Egypt.

Iran is also developing a Shihab-4, with an estimated range of 2,000 kilometres. The development of the long-range system has caused some concern in western Europe. Despite Tehran's promises to Europe that it would halt Shihab-4's development, it appears Iran is continuing with the project.

U.S. told Israel will react to any Iraqi strikes

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — The United States understands that Israel "will not sit quietly" if Iraq attacks it in response to any American assault on Saddam Hussein, senior American officials told Prime Minister Ariel Sharon this past weekend.

The officials also promised Israel will be told in advance of any American plan to attack Iraq, so that it can prepare its defences.

These were two of the key assurances Sharon had sought in his Washington meetings with U.S. President George W. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice last Thursday.

His hosts did not give Sharon any details of the next stages of the U.S. war on terrorism, saying they have not yet made any final decision. But both Sharon and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, who was also in Washington last week, said they received the impression that the United States is determined to act against Iraq, and that Iraq is currently the focus of its Middle East policy.

Israeli sources said that Iraq will also be the focus of Cheney's visit to the region next month, which will include a two-day stopover in Israel.

Ben-Eliezer told his American counterpart, Donald Rumsfeld, that Israel is preparing for the possibility of an Iraqi strike against it in response to an American attack, including the possibility that it could use chemical or biological weapons. Iraq did not use such weapons during the Gulf War, but Israel believes it may do so this time, Ben-Eliezer said.

A senior Pentagon delegation, led by Undersecretary of Defence Doug Feith, will visit Israel next month for a meeting of the joint Defence Policy Advisory Group (DPAG), which has not met since October 2000. The talks will apparently centre on preparations for an American attack on Iraq.

Sharon also discussed the Iranian threat with his hosts – Tehran's efforts to obtain nuclear weapons, its support for anti-Israel terrorism in Lebanon and the territories, and its efforts to foment discontent among Israeli Arabs.

In addition, Sharon warned of the danger that the northern border could heat up, citing incidents such as Hezbollah's recent firing of anti-aircraft missiles at Israeli air force planes on Israel's side of the border. The United States believes that Iran is behind Hezbollah's activity, but Sharon said the organization could not act without encouragement, or at least tacit consent, from Syria, the de facto ruling power in Lebanon.

The Americans then promised to warn Syria against permitting any escalation on Israel's northern border. Sharon said the question of restarting Israeli-Syrian negotiations did not arise.

French Jews want anti-Semitism on table

By ANDREW DIAMOND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — With presidential elections approaching, French Jewish leaders see an opportunity to air their grievances with a government they believe has waffled in its response to anti-Semitic aggression.

The election landscape became slightly more treacherous this week as Jean-Marie Le Pen, longtime leader of the extreme-right National Front, announced he has the signatures of 500 elected officials needed to run in the first round of presidential elections this April.

During some three decades on the national stage, Le Pen has made no secret of his anti-Semitic views, a tactic that has contributed to his support in conservative areas of southeastern France.

On a national radio show in 1987, Le Pen called the Nazi gas chambers a "detail" of World War II. The comment earned him widespread notoriety – and was followed by the strongest electoral returns of his career: in the first round of the 1988 presidential election, Le Pen amassed nearly 15 per cent of the vote.

Since that time his support has waned. A large contingent of National Front members defected in 1999 and formed a new centre-right party, the Republican National Movement, under the former party secretary of the National Front, Bruno Megret.

Following Megret's lead, Le Pen is trying to reinvent himself as a more "respectable" candidate of the centre-right.

"I am not perfect," he said recently about his history of anti-Semitic remarks, which Le Pen now refers to as "unfortunate phrases."

Le Pen, 73, appears to have toned down his rhetoric for his fourth – and, in all likelihood, final – presidential bid.

But his "France First" platform still contains an anti-Jewish plank.

In December, a National Front primer entitled "Le Pen Was, Is, And Will Be Right" revisited the candidate's past views on the Jewish "lobby" in France.

"We would be wrong to forget the role of the Jewish Masonic International of B'nai B'rith," Le Pen said.

"This powerful and hidden minority has chosen to erect invisible barriers inside the French people."

So far, it appears doubtful that Le Pen's new posture of "respectability" will appeal to many voters in the political centre.

The French daily Le Monde, for example, greeted his campaign announcement with derisive cartoons and the caption, "He presents himself as 'a man of the centre-right,' but his program has not changed."

While Le Pen may not be a viable candidate for president, his presence in the contest may be problematic for Jewish organizations seeking a stronger government response to a rise in anti-Semitic attacks.

In the latest such incident, anti-Semitic vandals defaced a statue in Paris honoring Alfred Dreyfus, scrawling a Star of David and writing the words "Dirty Jew" on the statue.

In a case that sparked a wave of anti-Semitism in France, Dreyfus, a Jewish captain in the French army, was falsely convicted of treason in 1894, publicly degraded and sent to Devil's Island, a penal colony in South America. He served five years of a life sentence before receiving a presidential pardon.

In three other anti-Semitic incidents earlier this year, groups of Arab youths stoned Jewish teenagers and schoolchildren in Paris suburbs.

Most of those incidents passed under the radar of the French media, but the French dailies did discuss anti-Semitic violence at the end of 2001.

In a presidential campaign that thus far has emphasized rising juvenile delinquency and the need for greater security from attacks by teenagers, French Jews are depending on media attention to force the two presidential frontrunners, incumbent Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Lionel Jospin, to take more assertive positions on anti-Semitism.

Many French Jews believe the inclusion of such discussion in the campaign is more important than who wins.

French Jewish leaders have for a long time criticized both leading candidates for downplaying the seriousness of anti-Semitic incidents. With Le Pen's entry into the race, they face an additional challenge as they seek to make their voices heard.

In the past, Le Pen has made insinuations about the "Jewish lobby's" alleged power over the national media – a message that some fear could colour and confuse coverage of Jewish issues.

British MPs want to prosecute Muslim hate preachers

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Members of parliament last week called on the British government to arrest and prosecute Muslim extremists who advocate harming Jews.

The MPs issued their appeal after gathering evidence that appears to connect some Muslim militants to illegal acts of incitement.

The MPs wrote to Home Secretary David Blankett about Muslim extremism after British authorities decided a month ago to end the investigation of five young people suspected of circulating materials that called openly for the killing of Jews.

Authorities concluded there was a "lack of evidence" to guarantee a conviction, since the materials were distributed in just one north London neighbourhood, and because they were not believed to pose a danger to public order.

British media also reported last week about four Muslim preachers whom Labour MP Andrew Dismore says have proliferated anti-Semitic propaganda. Dismore said he can't understand why steps haven't been taken against the four.

One of the men, Abu Hamza, the imam of a north London mosque, has been seen on video telling youths to kill anyone who does not believe in Islam.

Another, Bakri Muhammad, the leader of the extremist Al-Muhajiroun group, has preached openly in favour of killing Jews and took steps to recruit British youths for the Taliban.

London police and the MI5 security service have not taken direct steps against the four since they have provided information about activities of terror organizations that has helped authorities keep tabs on terror suspects.

War of words erupts between Israel and Iran

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A war of words erupted between Israel and Iran last week.

On Tuesday of last week, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres claimed Iran is sending its elite Revolutionary Guards to Lebanon to prepare for an attack on Israel.

Iran has "converted Lebanon into a ball of explosives, endangering the future of Lebanon," Peres said in New York after meeting with UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

Peres also said Iran is arming Hezbollah terrorists in Lebanon with thousands of missiles that can strike Israeli cities.

Peres' comments came as Iran's defence minister, Admiral Ali Shamkhani, responded to a reporter's hypothetical question by saying that "if Israel carries out any military action against Iran, it will face a response that will be unimaginable to any Israeli politician."

Shamkhani said he was not referring to a nuclear response, but added that "time will tell" what the response would be.

But Israel's transportation minister, Ephraim Sneh, denied suggestions by Tehran that Israel might attack Iran's nuclear power plant.

Also on Tuesday of last week, Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz described Iranian efforts to obtain a nuclear capability as a long-term threat.

Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz

Briefing the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee, Mofaz also said that Israel had developed the capability during the past year to protect itself from an Iranian missile attack.

Cabinet minister Dan Meridor said the same day that Israel is trying to convince Russia and western countries to cut links with Iran as long as it seeks to develop weapons of mass destruction.

On Wednesday, Peres defended Israel's vocal anti-Iranian policy, saying it was the duty of leaders in the Jewish State to raise their voices when they detected the "smell of Hitler."

He later deflected criticism of his remarks. "When you smell the smell of Hitler, you must raise your voice," he said. "You need neither strategy nor tactics – you must tell the truth."

Israeli officials have been playing up the threat from Iran after U.S. President George W. Bush referred to Tehran in his State of the Union speech last month as being part of an "axis of evil" along with North Korea and Iraq.

During separate visits to Washington last week, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer weret expected to discuss the threat posed by Iran. Before the talks, Israeli leaders reviewed their country's Iranian policy.

Sharon, along with Peres and Ben-Eliezer, also met recently with heads of the Israeli security establishment to determine the content of their warnings about the Islamic Republic.

Israel is not alone in warning about Iranian adventurism: Jordan is claiming that Iran was behind a series of attempted attacks on Israel from Jordanian territory.

The London-based newspaper Asharq Al-Awsat reported last Tuesday that Jordanian authorities foiled 17 attempted mortar and rocket attacks on Israel.

Both U.S. and Jordanian sources told the paper that Iran was "directly and clearly" involved in 17 attempts to fire missiles and mortar shells into Israel from Jordan. The attempted attacks were carried out by Hamas and Islamic Jihad militants trained in Iran – and in Hezbollah camps in Lebanon, the newspaper said.

Citing sources in the U.S. administration, the newspaper said Jordan's King Abdullah provided U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell with evidence of the plot. A senior Jordanian source told the paper that King Abdullah had telephoned Iranian President Mohammed Khatami to complain, but the president said he has no control over such operations, which are run by his conservative rivals.

Abdullah also told the Americans that Jordan has prevented 70 terror attacks against Israel from within its territory, the paper said. "Our American friends know we have saved many Israeli lives by foiling these attacks," it quoted the king as saying.

Official Iran is not the only Iran

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

When Mossad chief Ephraim Halevy spoke recently about "unobserved signals" from Iran about the possibility of rapprochement, he was presumably referring to people like Abdullah Nuri.

Backgrounder

In 1999, Nuri, one of the leaders of Iran's reformist camp, criticized his country's policy on Israel and the Mid-East peace process and was sent to jail. Nuri, who served as interior minister under President Mohammed Khatami – he is considered to be one of Khatami's closest advisers – and later edited a reformist newspaper, called Israel "a cancerous growth," but nevertheless disagreed with Iran's opposition to the peace process.

Nuri is still in jail and his paper has been shut down. But even though few would dare to say so out loud, there appear to be many in Iran who agree with him. Khatami's advisor, Mohammed Reza Tajik, told a conference in Tehran in December that Iran should "compromise between ideology and national interests." The Iranian leadership, he said, "is more Palestinian than the Palestinians," which is the reason for "our isolation."

The problem, from Jerusalem's perspective, is that those who favour a new approach to Israel are not the ones who hold the real power. Khatami was twice elected by a large majority, but his reformist camp is currently at its lowest point. Foreign and defence policy is still controlled by Iran's supreme spiritual leader, Ali Khamenei, who has at least twice in the last two years publicly expressed support for wiping Israel off the map. Statements of this type, even though they may not reflect the majority of public opinion in Iran, are more often heard in Iran than statements such as those made by Tajik or Nuri.

Brigadier General (res.) Shlomo Brom, a former senior official in the IDF's Plans and Policy Directorate and now a researcher at Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, said that Iranian intellectuals he has met have told him that the anti-Israel rhetoric is strictly for internal consumption. He believes that Israel's vocal anti-Iranian policy merely strengthens "the Iranian threat." Iran, he says, is very sensitive to what Israel says about it: In recent years, it has even raised its level of military alert following interviews by the commander of the Israel Air Force in the air force's bulletin.

Woman speed skater bears Israel's Olympic hopes

By JESSICA STEINBERG
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Olga Danilov glides along the ice, one hand brushing the smooth surface, the other tucked behind her back.

Thigh muscles pumping, she skates along a trail of rubber markers placed along the ice, using them as a guide for her daily laps.

Between runs, Israel's Olympic speed skater throws on her blue and white warmup suit and skates over to her three-year-old daughter, Nicole, who is sitting on a stool at the rink's edge, drinking hot chocolate and eating cookies.

Speaking in Russian, her coach, Boris Drabkin, calls out her time: "9.2 seconds."

She grimaces, straps her helmet back on and returns to the ice for another series of laps.

Over the loudspeaker, a tape of Russian folksongs for children is playing, Nicole's favourite music while she watches her mother practice.

Danilov and two figure-skating couples represent the entire Israeli team participating in the Winter Olympic Games, which began Feb. 8 in Salt Lake City.

Outside the windows of Metulla's Canada Centre, the home of the Israel Ice Skating Federation, snow-capped Mount Hermon can be seen rising majestically in the distance.

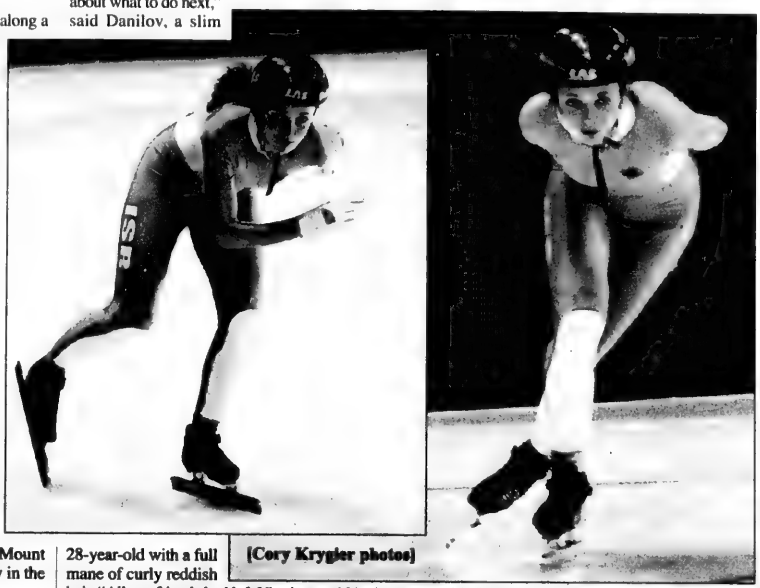
"Some say we're not really a winter sports country," said Judith Javor, general secretary of the local council in the town of Metulla, located in northern Israel. "But if you look out the window, it sure looks like it."

"We Jews have to develop our cultural side, and sports is part of culture. It's the life that we immigrants know about," said Drabkin, who moved to northern Israel 11 years ago.

Both Danilov and Drabkin are immigrants – Danilov from Ukraine and Drabkin from Russia.

Danilov followed her sister to Israel in 1994. Drabkin came with his wife from Moscow, where he trained the Russian national speed skating team.

"I had finished school and was thinking about what to do next," said Danilov, a slim 28-year-old with a full mane of curly reddish hair. "All my friends had left Ukraine, and I had been thinking about Israel for a while."



[Cory Krygier photos]

She had heard about Drabkin while still living in Ukraine, and got in touch with him soon after arriving at her sister's home in Netanya.

Drabkin already had been living in Israel for several years. He was instrumental in creating the speed-skating program at the Canada Centre and helping Israel gain membership in the Winter Olympics.

"It was hard back then because we didn't have skaters and we didn't have experience," said Drabkin, who cleaned floors in Tel Aviv during his first year in Israel. "I started to build the first roots, working with local kids. And then Olga came from Ukraine."

Danilov has been skating since she was three years old. She moved from figure skating to long-track and then to short-track skating in her teens, competing in international events.

By the time she finished school, politics had changed the face of her country, and she started thinking about moving to Israel.

By 1995, Danilov was living in Israel and training for the 1998 Olympics. She needed to be in the top 20 in the world in order to qualify, but only made it to 22nd.

Missing the 1998 Olympics was devastating, but there were soon some joys to make up for it, including her marriage to Alex Danilov, an Israeli Olympic competitor in shooting, and the birth of Nicole shortly after.

She returned to training in late 1999, making her way through a series of international competitions and working toward the 2002 Olympics.

But since 1998, her perspective has changed.

"I thought that if I wasn't in the 1998 Olympics it would be the end of the world," she said, rolling her eyes and grinning. "This year it's important, but there are other important aspects of my life as well. In some ways, the Olympics feels like any other competition."

However, for Drabkin and other skating federation officials who have been involved in Israel's Olympic trials, Danilov's participation is very significant.

"This is Israel's third time in the Winter Olympics, although it is the first time the country is participating in speed skating," Javor said. "The Olympic committee is getting used to having Israel participate in winter sports, as is the International Skating Union. We still have to work very hard, but having Olga helps."

During last year's European Speed Skating Championships in the Netherlands, Danilov finished fifth out of 29 competitors in the 500-metre race, and seventh out of 27 in the 1,000-metre event.

In the recent Short Track World Cup Competition held in Amsterdam, she made it to the second round in the 1,000-metre event, finishing with the 24th best time. She finished 28th in the 1,500-metre event, and was 38th in the 500.

There are four short-track events in this year's Olympics, ranging from 500 metres to 1,500 metres. Danilov will have to compete in several heats for each race in order to make it to the semi-finals and then the finals.

Will she earn a medal?

"Hard to say. Speed skating is 95 per cent hard work and five per cent talent," Drabkin said.

Said Danilov: "I always say, it will be b'seder [Hebrew for all right]."

American figure skater goes for the gold

By CARIN DAVIS
The Jewish Journal of Greater of Los Angeles

LOS ANGELES — "Joey likes Rachel!"

In an Ice Chalet snack bar here, six typical teens squeal about the television show Friends and lace their skates. Among them, an eye-catching brunette balances against a table and lifts her left foot to meet her back. The banner above the skate rental booth, constructed with orange paper and Scotch tape, reads: "Congratulations! Sasha Cohen 2002 Silver Medalist, you're going to the Olympics!"

The flexible brunette? Not just a typical teenager.

Sasha Cohen, 17, will be one of three female figure skaters to represent the United States in the 2002 Winter Olympics. The sassy high school senior – who earned the silver medal with her second-place finish at the recent U.S. championships – overcame a debilitating injury and will travel to Salt Lake City to fulfill her Olympic dream.

"I'm looking forward to everything: opening and closing ceremonies, staying in the village, hopefully skating my best and winning the medal," Cohen says, glossing her lips.

Fan mail covers the snack counter, and a pint-sized girl asks Cohen to autograph her skate. The Orange County teen seems unfazed by her new celebrity status.

"It's exciting and fun, but it's not reality. I'm enjoying it now, but when it's not here, that's OK, too," Cohen says, fidgeting with the zipper on her rhinestoned black hood. In fact, Cohen seems more excited about her upcoming winter formal and her kitten, Mia, than the media attention.

The 5-foot-1, 94-pound bundle of energy and radiance didn't have a bat mitzvah, but she always wears a gold medallion with a Star of David on the back. The gift from her grandmother's friend can even be seen around her neck during competitions.

"The front is an astrological map for my birthday, and the back is my lucky star," Cohen says.

Her parents, Roger, an international business consultant and lawyer, and Gelina, are members of Shir Ha-Ma'alot, a Reform congregation, and her 13-year-old sister, Natasha, attends Tarbut V'Torah Community Day School.

Her journey to the Olympics is not a typical "Go For the Gold" story either.

Last year, she discovered a stress fracture in a vertebra and was forced to withdraw from the 2001 U.S. Nationals and miss the skating season. Isolated from competition, the strong-willed Cohen held fast to her Olympic dream.

Judy and David call 10-year-old Tajja Isen a future 'superstar'

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When young talent is discovered, you don't expect it to happen in a synagogue.

But that is exactly where it happened to singer and actress Tajja Isen at the age of six.

"It was about four years ago that I was at Temple Emanu-El and happened to be walking by the children's choir as they were warming up for services," says entertainer and YTV television personality, David Gershon, of the husband and wife duo Judy and David.

"Suddenly, I was struck by a wonderful sound, which turned out to be the voice of Tajja Isen," Gershon says. "I ran to get Judy and we asked Tajja to sing for both of us. It was truly a moment to remember... this pure, innocent, beautiful sound coming from an equally beautiful child.

"A few moments talking with Tajja revealed that she was equally beautiful inside. She's a wonderful soul – unselfconscious, unpretentious and full of joy."

"Within weeks of our meeting Tajja that day at Temple Emanu-El, she began recording with us," Gershon says. "She later appeared on our TV show and more recently, on stage with us. We have met many talented kids through the course of our career, but Tajja's one that we hope will give us a job one day when she's a superstar!"

The admiration is mutual.

"I've done some tapes and CDs with Judy and David and it is a lot of fun," says Tajja, now 10.

"I sing my heart out in the studio. I also performed at their recent Chanukah concert. At the concert, I sang one of the two solos I sang on their Rock 'N Roll Matzah Ball CD. I sang the song Dodi Li. It is very exciting to sing in the studio, but I find it a lot more thrilling to perform live."

Tajja Isen

Other of Tajja's recording collaborations with Judy and David include the Juno Award-winning Little Yellow Bus, Beanstalk, Reds In The Hood and Goldirocks.

The Grade 5 student at Ventura Park Public School in Thornhill, Ont., sings in choirs at school and the temple but has never taken singing lessons (or dancing and acting lessons). Music runs in her family: her great-grandfather, Morris Tajja, was a professional musician with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and her grandfather, Mel, is a piano teacher.

Through her association with Judy and David, Tajja signed with agent Shari Quallenberg of Talent Vision last fall. One month later, she captured a voice-over role.

Church minister describes her conversion to Judaism

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

When a major earthquake struck Northridge, Calif., in January 1994, it did more than break dishes and overturn furniture.

For Dolores Gray, an African-American ordained minister and executive with Continental Airlines, the upheaval around her mirrored the turmoil that had plagued her soul for years, and out of the chaos her decision became clear: she would make her home in Israel.

A descendant of sharecroppers from Mound Bayou, Miss., Dolores, who renamed herself Ahuvah (meaning beloved) had for years felt drawn to what she calls her "Jewish roots." In My Sister, The Jew (Targum Press), Ahuvah Gray chronicles her spiritual search, beginning with her childhood visits to her devout Christian grandparents. She takes us through her transformation by study and prayer and the difficulties of her conversion to her life today in the Orthodox community of Bayit Vegan in Israel.

On a recent lecture tour, Gray recalled her grandparents' influence, the shalom bayit she found in their home and the example of prayer and devotion they set.

"The training and discipline I got in my grandparents' home is what conditioned me to live as an Orthodox Jew. These are two of the most devout people I ever met."

Gray is frequently asked how a former minister came to reconcile her Christian upbringing and training with her Judaism.

This was no instant metamorphosis. Her family pastor, Dr. Charles Queen, still a close friend, taught his congregation Hebrew and the oneness of God. He journeyed to Israel many times and conducted a Passover seder for his congregation every year. One of Gray's friends asked her: "Does this man realize he was preparing you for Judaism?"

"No one ever explained the Trinity to me where it made a lot of sense," said Gray, who made 14 trips to Israel in four years before moving there.

"I realized I was going through a transition. For a five-year period I had stopped going to church, stayed at home, started reading my Bible and davened three times a day."

She had to tell her family she would no longer be home for Christmas; it helped that they were supportive.

"My parents raised us not to be hypocrites, and [told us] whatever we do we should do with dignity."

Ten-year-old Tajja Isen called a 'superstar'

"I do the voice of Sister Bear on the Nelvana animated production of The Berenstain Bears with Camilla Scott, who plays Mama Bear," Tajja says. "Sister Bear is very sweet. She's also one of the boys – as good as her older brother, Brother Bear."

Despite her success in show business, Tajja hasn't let it go to her head.

"My friends only know some of the things I do," she says. "I try to keep it private. I don't want a lot of people talking to me about it. It is something they can find out by themselves. One of my friends went to the Chanukah concert and was very surprised."

Tajja is named, though with a slight spelling variation, after singer Taja Seville, who recorded Love is Contagious in the late '80s, a favourite tune of Tajja's parents Jordie and Karen during their courtship.

About her family, Tajja says, "Sometimes, I feel like a mother of three. I'm the oldest of four. I have a six-year-old brother, Joshua, a two-year-old brother, Kobe, and a four-year-old sister, Nissae."

When the actress is not taking care of her younger siblings, she takes religious studies and Hebrew lessons at her temple. She also likes to read and plans to spend some of her earnings on books. Her favourite stories are fantasy adventures about bats – creatures she loves – such as those in the books Silverwing and Sunwing by Canadian author Kenneth Oppel.

Tajja also loves to travel. "I've been to Jamaica, Florida and places in Canada, but the longest flight I've been on was to Trinidad; some of my family is from there, I intend to do more. We are hoping our next trip is back to Florida."

Travellers are lured to Europe by its alluring cities, fabulous museums, rich historical lore and backroad beauty.

If you're planning a European trip, you can do no better than consult Read This First: Europe, published by Lonely Planet and distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books.

Read This First is packed with vital and concise information about 36 countries and the myriad sights they offer. Don't leave home without it.

After Spain, England is probably Europe's most popular destination. England (Raincoast), brimming with sensible insights and tips, is a reliable and authoritative guide.

Belgium and Luxembourg are probably the least known destinations in Europe. But a perusal of Belgium & Luxembourg (Raincoast) quickly dispells the notion that they are dull countries best left unseen.

Should you be thinking of retracing a celebrated route from Europe to Nepal, immerse yourself in Istanbul To Kathmandu (Raincoast).

The route, made famous by ancient explorers, is a fascinating journey from the minarets of Turkey and the bazaars of Iran to the snow-capped peaks of Nepal.

What a journey!

Save them for a quieter time in world affairs.

Christian minister drawn to her 'Jewish roots'

If audiences wonder about racism Gray may face among the Orthodox, their concerns are quickly laid to rest. "In my neighbourhood, most of the people walk around in black suits and black hats, so when people ask me have I experienced difficulty in the Orthodox community, I just tell them that I moved from one black neighbourhood to another.

"These people lead impeccable lives. They live by the Torah and 613 mitzvos, and I am privileged to sit at the Shabbos table with them."

She admits, however, that she would not have found such unconditional acceptance had she sought conversion in the United States.

"One of the reasons I left America is because of racism. Even a close friend said to me when I told her of my plans to convert to Judaism, 'Dolores, why would you want double trouble?'"

My Sister, The Jew never fails to inspire. "My ability to persevere comes through prayer," Gray writes. "If I want to be a Jew, I have to daven, study the Torah, and do mitzvos... In the end this thing is just between God and me."

FILM FEST TO OPEN WITH QUESTION, "WAS ELVIS JEWISH?"

A new film written and directed by Montrealer Max Wallace raises the astonishing possibility that Elvis Presley, who died 25 years ago, was technically Jewish, since his maternal great-great-grandmother, Nancy Burdine Tackett, was Jewish.

Wallace's film, Schmelvis, makes its world premiere April 20 as the prestigious opening night presentation of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF), with the filmmakers in attendance.

The film explores issues related to Elvis's potential Jewishness as it follows an unlikely cabal of Elvis fans on a pilgrimage to his famed Memphis mansion, Graceland, and beyond. In addition to Wallace, the group includes the film's executive producer Evan M. Beloff, producer Ari A. Cohen, an Orthodox Elvis impersonator, and Montreal Rabbi Reuben Poupko.

"This will be a really fun kick-off to the festival's 10th anniversary," said TJFF programming director Shlomo Schwartzberg. "Mark April 20 in your date book. You won't want to miss this one."

Incredibly, a notable Toronto printing house, ECW press, is readying a tie-in book for April publication. Odds are the film and book will generate masses of publicity as the media begins to fathom the fascinating possibilities of this revolutionary bit of quasi-Jewish genealogy.

For details on Schmelvis and other breaking news from the TJFF, visit the Web site at www.tjff.com. Due to the increasing cost of postage and the fact that the festival's mailing list has swelled to almost 10,000 names, festival management is encouraging patrons to register online to receive its e-mail newsletters. Simply visit the Web site and click on the News and Schmooze option, or phone 416-324-9121.

Richler Tribute I: The Toronto Jewish Film Society presents A Tribute to Mordecai Richler at the Art Gallery of Ontario this week. The program includes three short films based on Richler short stories – The Street, Mortimer Griffin and Shalinsy, and Bambinger, all produced by the National Film Board. AGO, Jackman Hall. $8. Feb. 17, 7:45 p.m. (An earlier screening, at 5:15, is for members only.) 416-924-6211.

Richler Tribute II: Fans of Mordecai Richler may be tempted to visit Ottawa this month to hear what promises to be a memorable panel discussion on the late scribe.

The panelists are Bernard Dov Cooperman, a history professor at the University of Maryland, who will discuss the author's treatment of the immigrant neighbourhood; Linda Morra, an English professor at the University of Ottawa, who will explore the author's satire of Canadian cultural nationalism; and Norman Ravvin, a professor of Canadian Jewish studies at Concordia University in Montreal, who plans to examine Richler's fascination with the "big event" of World War II in St. Urbain's Horseman.

The event is called The Whirlwind Elsewhere: Mordecai Richler and Our Compromised Times. (You'll have to attend to discover the meaning of the name.) Sponsors are the National Library of Canada, Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation and the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

National Library of Canada, Auditorium, 395 Wellington St., Ottawa. Free admission; refreshments. Sunday, Feb. 24, 2 p.m. 613-992-9988.

Inspirational Music: The Beth Tikvah Synagogue Choir and the Blessed Trinity Catholic Liturgical Choir perform with harpist Erica Goodman, organist Michael Schuck, cantor Benjamin Maissner and the Festival String Quartet.

The concert is offered in "a spirit of ecumenism and brotherhood" as a response to "these unsettled days, when basic human rights and freedoms of people everywhere are under constant threat." The choirs will perform singly as well as join their 75 voices together to sing pieces by Haydn, Mendelssohn, Brahms and Glick.

Blessed Trinity Church, 3220 Bayview Ave., North York. $10. Sunday, Feb. 17, 3 p.m. 416-221-3433.

Bernstein Drama: In the mid-1970s composer Leonard Bernstein left his wife to live with a much younger man, only to return to the family home after he learned his wife was dying. Martin Julien's play, The Unanswered Question, explores Bernstein's search for identity through the prism of both his intimate relationships and his musical ideas.

Between Stages presents a public reading of The Unanswered Question, starring Steve Cumyn, Phillipa Domville and Richard Greenblatt, with the playwright in attendance. Miles Nadal JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. Free admission. Saturday, Feb. 16, 8 p.m.

Britain's truly unique experience

Guest Voice

For five days, from Dec. 23 to 27, more than 2,000 Jews from around the world gathered at Nottingham University in England's Midlands for an extraordinary feast of Jewish learning called The Limmud Conference. The majority of the participants were, like our family, lay people, with varied interests in Jewish learning, religion, education, spirituality and culture.

Limmud – Hebrew for "learning" – is an annual opportunity to participate in a pluralistic environment where a community of multi-denominational Jews learn together in lectures, seminars, concerts, workshops and discussions. Our family was blown away by our first trip to Limmud.

More than 300 speakers addressed issues and aspects of Jewish life in a rich and diverse selection of 650 sessions. The atmosphere was inspiring, as the ruach within the hallways abounded with conversations on philosophical, spiritual, political and social matters.

Limmud, which relies almost completely on volunteers, is an independent organization; no movement, federation or benefactor dictates the agenda. It is organized by a large group of passionate and pluralist British Jews who share a dedication to Jewish learning and the continuing development of Jewish education.

Along with hundreds of British Jews, Limmud was attended by international delegations from Clal/Rikma, a North American group that brings rabbis and rabbinical students of all religious denominations together for study, as well as the National Union of Israeli Students, kibbutz representatives and academics and rabbis from around the world.

Meals were served communally. It was common to sit down at supper and become engrossed in conversation with someone many years older whose thoughts would inspire attendance at a learning session you might never have considered. The plethora of opportunities to "dip" and "taste" were endless.

So what makes this annual conference so magical? Perhaps it is that all presenters are also participants, making everyone at the conference both a learner and a teacher. Perhaps it is the warmth and genuine interest that participants express toward each other. Limmud is for anyone: it embraces individuals from many different backgrounds: young and old, politically left or right, religious and secular. Limmud encourages questions and provides a forum for continued development and progression.

Some Program Highlights:

Following various pluralistic prayer services each morning, 450 people gathered in one room for the Limmud Chavruta Project. Chavruta, meaning pair or friendship in Hebrew, is a traditional method of Jewish learning where texts are studied with a partner or small group. The theme of this year's chavruta project was kedushah, meaning holiness. Together, as Reform, Conservative and Orthodox Jews, we explored what holiness means to us, and how we can employ and create space for it in our lives. No matter what one's previous background was in Jewish textual learning, each individual benefited from the experience of appreciating what holy time and holy space meant to them.

International Jewish educators, artists and philosophers came from all over the world to Limmud. Canada was represented by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel in Toronto.

Some of the other speakers included: Blu Greenberg, an Orthodox Jewish feminist striving for the recognition of female Orthodox rabbis; Lord Robert Winston, a world expert on fertility and stem cell research; Steve Greenberg, an Orthodox rabbi who produced the extraordinary film Trembling before God, a documentary about Chassidic and Orthodox Jews who are gay or lesbian; and Yitz Greenberg, a thinker who challenged us to find purpose in our time.

The sessions were divided into tracks encompassing Israel, Jewish philosophy, Jewish religious texts, visual arts, Jewish spirituality and Jewish community.

The following is a listing of some sessions we attended:

• Under the Israel track: the media and Israel, the collapse of the peace process, Judaism and democracy in Israel, origins of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

• Within the philosophy track: Jewish response to suffering, psychoanalysis and Jewish identity, and Maimonides, Soloveitchik and Nietzsche.

• In the spirituality track: Torah yoga, Kabbalah, and Jewish meditation.

There were also musical presentations by a young Jewish a cappella group called Kol Rina and a Jewish Ladino band called Los Desterados, as well as sessions on the music of the Chassidic world and a look at the music of the Second Temple.

Limmud was exciting and exhilarating. We recommend it wholeheartedly for a wonderful family experience. It broadens the mind and is just one more step on each of our own Jewish journeys. Limmud encourages every participant to reflect upon living life within both the Jewish and secular worlds and is of invaluable worth in cultivating a richer and more tolerant Jewish community.

Could we achieve such an annual conference and ongoing pluralistic programming in Toronto? Absolutely. This is an essential ingredient for fostering Jewish continuity and the development of the next generation of Jewish leaders.

At Limmud, we experienced a treasure chest of learning and light. As Jeremiah 6:16 states: "So says God: See and search for what the way of good is. And journey in it." And that is exactly what we did.

Patriots owner scores big among Jews, too

By JACOB HOROWITZ
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BOSTON — Robert Kraft may or may not have said a Shehechiyanu prayer when his New England Patriots scored the game-winning field goal in this year's Super Bowl, but there was no mistaking the elation of this Jewish businessman and philanthropist.

Kraft nearly leapt through the glass window of his skybox at the Superdome in New Orleans as the clock ticked down on a last second 20-17 victory over the heavily favoured St. Louis Rams. The win brought the team its first Super Bowl title.

Kraft's passion, evident throughout the post-game's celebratory events, is not limited to football. Indeed, his presence – and philanthropic endeavours – has resonated far beyond the Patriots' front office.

Kraft and his wife, Myra, have been involved in Jewish and non-Jewish projects throughout the area. Their Jewish involvement extends beyond Boston to New York and Israel, where they have invested in study programs, absorption of Ethiopian Jews and a football stadium.

"Bob and Myra are truly an amazing combination," said Barry Shrage, president of Boston's Combined Jewish Philanthropies and a longtime friend of the family.

"They are two folks who are committed to all of the citizens of Greater Boston and the world, but they also have a strong connection and commitment to Israel and the Jewish people."

In 1989, the Krafts, in collaboration with Combined Jewish Philanthropies, introduced the Myra and Robert Kraft Passport to Israel Fund. The fund helps high school students taking Jewish studies go on an educational trip to Israel sometime between their sophomore and senior year. To date, thousands of students have gone on these trips.

The Krafts have also been active in developing the sister-city relationship between Boston and Haifa. In 1998, they participated in the renovation of an after-school enrichment centre that assists in the absorption, education and integration of Haifa's Ethiopian community.

Aside from their work with the Ethiopian Jewish community, the Krafts' impact and presence is felt across the State of Israel.

Kraft is the primary shareholder of Carmel Container Systems, Israel's largest packaging plant.

In 1997, he invested $40 million (US) in a plant in Caesarea in order to provide his company, which employs 700 people, with the most advanced technology available.

In 1999, Kraft brought his love of football to Israel in the form of a new stadium, Israel's first American football stadium. Kraft Stadium, at the northern end of Sacher Park in Jerusalem, is used to accommodate the Jerusalem-based American Touch Football in Israel league. Currently in 13th year, the league runs a 33-team, 500 player league.

Closer to home, the Krafts have promoted interfaith relations through various projects, one of which is the Kraft-Hiatt Fund, a joint endowment fund through which gifts to Holy Cross and Brandeis University are used to encourage a greater understanding between Christians and Jews.

Kraft's father, Harry Kraft, was a highly respected leader in the Jewish community of Brookline, a Boston suburb.

Myra Kraft, a 1964 Brandeis graduate and the daughter of Boston philanthropist Jacob Hiatt, has been a trustee at Brandeis since 1988. She also sits on the board of directors of Combined Jewish Philanthropies, is on their overseas committee and chairs the Israel program committee.

Beyond the Jewish world, Robert Kraft serves on the executive committee of the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute and on the board of overseers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He is also a trustee of Columbia University, his alma mater, and serves on the board of directors of the Harvard Business School, where he received his master's degree.

In April 2000, Kraft gave an $11.5 million (US) gift to Columbia University for the establishment of the Robert K. Kraft Centre for Jewish Student Life.

At the time, Kraft said the basement facility for Jewish students had not changed from the time he began at Columbia in 1963 to when his son David attended in 1991.

"For a school like Columbia University in New York City, with the number of Jewish students, it is very important that there would be this kind of facility," he said. "I just thought it was time to help."

Kraft's Jewish identity has occasionally trickled into his position as owner of the Patriots.

On Sept. 22, 1996, he asked that the kickoff of a game between the Patriots and the Jacksonville Jaguars be changed to avoid a conflict with Yom Kippur, which started at sundown that evening.

Fiedler solidifies position as top NFL quarterback

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — Last year, Jay Fiedler was something of a novel quarterback for the Miami Dolphins, playing his first game as a starter while replacing retired legend Dan Marino. Many NFL writers and commentators wondered if Fiedler would last the season.

Instead, Fiedler has twice emerged as the most valuable player with the Dolphins – an achievement that has been reserved in the past only for Marino.

Fiedler is one of only two NFL quarterbacks (the other is Kurt Warner of the St. Louis Rams) who has put together a 22-10 won-lost record over the past two seasons. In doing so, he rushed for more yards this season (337) than any Dolphins quarterback ever, and he has emerged as the second best Jewish quarterback ever to play the game, behind the legendary 1940s star, Sid Luckman of the Chicago Bears. Another few seasons of impressive statistics may put Fiedler on par with Luckman.

Jay Fiedler

"Without a doubt, Jay's belief in himself, his ability to run and his willingness to do what he can to win has made the difference to our team," said Dolphins coach Dave Wannstedt. "I want Jay to be our starting quarterback for many more years to come."

Despite Fiedler's impressive statistics in 2001 – completing 273 of 450 passes for 3,290 yards – the team's failure to run the ball and dropped passes at key times combined to limit the Dolphins to a first-round exit in the playoffs.

"It is very frustrating to lose early in the playoffs," Fiedler said. "What has kept me going is a belief in myself and the team. I always felt that in every game we had chances to come back when we fell behind."

Fiedler made his words come alive when he spearheaded five fourth quarter comebacks this season. His most impressive game was his come-from-behind win in Indianapolis on Nov. 11, after trailing 17-10 with 10 minutes remaining in the game.

Two key completions to wide receiver Chris Chambers made the difference. The first was a 74-yard pass that tied the game. It was Fiedler's longest completion of his career. Then, with 7:44 remaining, Fiedler's throw of 29 yards to Chambers netted the Dolphins a 27-24 victory.

Fiedler's scrambling skill – running to gain yards on broken plays – has made him exciting to watch.

With a good running back or a few more receivers, their first round playoff loss by a 20-3 score to the Baltimore Ravens might have been avoided.

Trailing 17-3 in the fourth quarter, Fiedler seemed on the way to another fourth quarter comeback, engineering what appeared to be a touchdown drive. On third down, Fiedler threw a perfect deep pass to the Baltimore eight-yard line that should have been a touchdown. Instead, Dolphin receiver James McKnight missed the ball, allowed it to hit his neck and was then intercepted by the Ravens. The play in effect ended the Dolphins' season.

As disappointed as Fiedler was by losing to the Ravens, his most inspirational game came following the terrorist attacks on New York's World Trade Center on Sept. 11.

"I was born and raised in New York and had many friends working at the World Trade Center," Fiedler said. "I felt sad leading up to the game, but felt I had to do my best and keep the memory of my friends alive."

In his first game back after the terrorist attacks, Fiedler and the Dolphins trailed the Oakland Raiders 15-10 in the fourth quarter. A touchdown drive with a two-point conversion gave the Dolphins an 18-15 victory against the team that defeated them in the 2000 playoffs.

ספרותנו

הציונים החדשים מאת: תום שגב, כתר הוצאה לאור

תום שגב, יליד ירושלים (1945), בוגר האוניברסיטה העברית ודוקטור להיסטוריה. ספריו הקודמים - "1949 - הישראלים הראשונים", "חיילי הרשע - מפקדי מחנות הריכוז", "המיליון השביעי - הישראלים והשואה", ו"ימי הכלניות - ארץ ישראל בתקופת המנדט" עוררו הדים רבים בארץ ומחוצה לה. "ימי הכלניות" נבחר על-ידי חניו יורק טיימס כאחד מעשרת הספרים הטובים ביותר לשנת 2000.

"הציונים החדשים" איננו מגיע לרמת "ימי הכלניות" או "המיליון השביעי" אך הספר מעורר ענין בשל הדיון במושג מאוד עכשווי (ובלתי ברור): "פוסט-ציונות".

בהקדמה לספר שגב מזכיר לנו שלציונות מעולם לא היה סגנון אחיד. הרצל למשל לא היה בטוח שמדינת היהודים צריכה לקום בארץ ישראל ולשון העברית לא הייתה חשובה בעיניו. "הציונות של הרצל מצטיירת אפוא כהשקפת עולם... לא ממש פטריוטית - כל מה שהימין הפוליטי בישראל מזהה כיום כפוסט-ציונות". מהרצל עובר שגב לסקירת התגלגלותה של הציונות דרך החלום על "האדם החדש", העברי החדש שאמור היה "לדלג על אלפיים שנות הקיום בגולה ולהתחבר ישירות אל גיבורי התנ"ך." הוא מנתח את תקופת השואה בה הציונות הייתה מעל לכל חסרת ישע. משם למלחמת העצמאות ושנות העליה מצפון אפריקה ושינוי צביון החברה והתרבות בישראל ומכאן את הגדרת הציונות. שגב מדגיש את ההשפעה האמריקנית החל משנות ה-60 ואת המריבות הדתיות בארץ. סכסוכים על מקומה של הדת בחיי המדינה אינם דבר חדש ואף הם מהווים חלק מהשיגויים בתפיסת הציונות. מאז מלחמת ששת הימים המתנחלים בשטחים רואים עצמם כחלוצים חדשים; "הכיפה הסרוגה החליפה את כובע הטמבל." ובקוטב השני, זאב הרצוג מעורר סערה ציבורית בקביעתו ב- 1999 כי לאחר עשרות שנות חפירה אין שום הוכחה ארכיאולוגית לסיפורי התנ"ך, לתקופת האבות, יציאת מצרים, נדודים במדבר, כיבוש הארץ וכו'. עליית ש"ס שנולדה בשל תחושות קיפוח מביאה לזירה הפוליטית רטוריקה כדוגמת זו של אריה דרעי שטען שהציונות היא "תנועת כפירה המבקשת ליצור יהדות חדשה." וגם לעלייה ההמונית מרוסיה, לווכוח על אוסלו ולאינתיפאדה השפעות על צביונה של הציונות.

About Food

By NORENE GILLETZ

I'm quite experienced when it comes to reducing the fat in most recipes, but creating lower-fat cookies that taste terrific is difficult. I was delighted to discover a wonderful Canadian cookbook – One Smart Cookie by Julie Van Rosendaal of Calgary. This tip-packed 175-page book contains photos and more than 200 recipes for your favourite cookies, squares, brownies and biscotti… trimmed of fat, but not of flavour. This book will definitely help you reduce the fat in your favourite cookie recipes.

And 31-year-old Julie is really a smart cookie. She's lost 165 pounds and keeps in shape by exercising five days a week. She included low-fat cookies (in moderation) as part of her eating plan while testing recipes for this book. One Smart Cookie is available at major bookstores, or as a fund-raiser from Atid chapter, Hadassah, in Toronto. To order, contact Shayla at 416-447-2537. (Outside Toronto call 1-888-811-9866.)

Chocolava cookies have a deep chocolate flavour and are very addictive. To make big cookies, use about three times as much dough as directed and bake 20 to 25 minutes, until set around the edges but still soft in the middle.

These are sure to bring a smile to everyone's punim for Purim!

CHOCOLAVA COOKIES

1⅓ cups flour
1 cup sugar
⅓ cup packed brown sugar
½ cup cocoa
1 tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. salt
¼ cup stick margarine or butter, softened
3 large egg whites, lightly beaten
1 tsp. vanilla
icing sugar for rolling

Preheat oven to 400. In a large bowl, combine flour, sugar, brown sugar, cocoa, baking powder and salt, breaking up any lumps of brown sugar. Stir in margarine until the mixture is well combined and crumbly. Add egg whites and vanilla and stir just until the dough comes together.

Place a few heaping spoonfuls of icing sugar into a shallow dish. Roll dough into 1½-inch balls and roll the balls in icing sugar to coat.

Place 2 inches apart on a cookie sheet that has been sprayed with non-stick spray. Bake for 12 to 14 minutes, until just set around the edges but still soft in the middle. Transfer to a wire rack to cool.

Makes 2 dozen cookies.

Per cookie: 92 calories, 2.1 g fat (0.4 grams saturated), 18 grams carbohydrate, 0 mg cholesterol, 71 mg sodium, 1 g fiber, 20 per cent calories from fat.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

The Best Medicine

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

Message to the Community from Joseph Mapa, President and CEO

Adapting and Moving Forward

Many of you have heard through the media, that we experienced an outbreak of viral gastroenteritis (a stomach-flu-like virus) at Mount Sinai Hospital contained to the 17th level, and had to temporarily close our Schwartz/Reisman Emergency Center due to the number of staff who were affected by the virus. We are proud of our talented staff in the superb way they responded. We have reopened the Schwartz/Reisman Emergency Centre and operations are back at full capacity.

One of the most satisfying part of our work is the opportunity to improve and grow, despite our funding pressures. The results of the recent province-wide Emergency Patient Satisfaction Survey, conducted by the Ontario Hospital Association, are a good example of this. The report highlights areas of positive performance as well as opportunities to improve. It is the first-ever system-level scorecard on the performance of Ontario hospitals that provide emergency care.

In spite of having our Schwartz/Reisman Emergency Center under construction during the review, we were able to maintain a high level of satisfaction. For instance, in physician care we received four scores that were above the norm for overall care received from physicians, thoroughness of physician care and satisfactory answers from physicians, putting us in the 93rd and 96th percentiles compared with other teaching hospitals in the province.

There are many other developments demonstrating our commitment to our community, which is reflected by the wonderful leadership of our Board of Directors and Executive Committee. I am particularly grateful to Bernie Ghert, Lawrence Bloomberg, Michael Bregman, Lloyd Fogler, Steve Pustil, Heather Reisman, Gerry Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum for their exceptional guidance.

I urge you to refer to our publication Your Health Report on-line at www.mtsinai.on.ca/MediaAndNews/ for more information.

Respectfully,

Joseph Mapa
President and CEO, Mount Sinai Hospital

Planning a wedding? Marry at Marriott

When you plan a wedding, dozens of questions need answering, about date, budget, guest list, etc. Not least is the choice of venue.

This means more than a location. Everyone, bride, groom and guests, should know they're in good hands; and the right venue will offer the services which guarantee this.For prime service in a downtown location, there's nowhere better than the Marriott Eaton Centre Hotel. Among the top 15 per cent of the hotel market, says Director of Sales & Marketing Leah Leslie, Marriott has a reputation for a friendly, secure environment, and service that makes every guest feel at home.

Pay them a visit, and see for yourself.

As you leave the parking garage, a clean, bright elevator takes you to a spacious, well-lit ballroom foyer. Or, if you come in through a ballroom entrance, an escalator takes you down to the elegant, marble registration desk.

As you enter the foyer, someone always approaches to greet you. From your first step, even before making reservations, you're an honoured guest.

The spaces are as functional as they are beautiful, in what Leslie calls "transitional" style. Classical and simple, yet modern, it's malleable, and can be decorated to suit many themes and tastes.

The foyer is ideal for receptions. It is tastefully decorated with comfortable, movable sofa groupings, easy chairs and credenzas with floral arrangements.

There are two luxurious ballrooms. The Grand Ballroom is divisible into five sections; fully open, it accommodates over 500 guests for dinner and dancing. The Trinity, also with five sections, holds up to 200. Movable divisions allow dynamic use of space for reception, cocktails, dinner and dance. For a more intimate wedding, rehearsal dinner or ceremony, there are smaller rooms.

Both ballrooms, in rich jewel tones of burgundy and gold, are pillar-free for optimum sight lines. Warm maplewood accents blend with fabric wall coverings around the perimeter of each room. The deep burgundy carpet matches the comfortable, sturdy chairs.

Elegant crystal chandeliers and matching wall sconces add opulence, bringing out the warm but elegant colours. The chandeliers, easily adjusted by dimmers, will create lighting suited to your occasion.

Every aspect of your surroundings is important. Washrooms are spacious and well-appointed, with matching marble floors and countertops. They are on the same level as the ballrooms, and wheelchair accessible.

The professional service matches the setting. An experienced wedding planner, sensitive to the individuality of bride and groom, will attend your event from beginning to end.

The four wedding packages are priced competitively, starting at $79 per guest. Each includes taxes, gratuities, overnight bridal suite, and complimentary menu tasting for four people. The most elaborate package can encompass every detail: flowers, chair covers, full bar, champagne for the bridal suite, and white glove service.

You can order dinner a la carte, or create your own from the banquet menu. Prepared by accomplished banquet chefs, it will be served by welcoming, efficient waiters. The staff is experienced in hosting Jewish events, and working with kosher caterers.

Are you planning some other event? While well-equipped to host large corporate meetings, the Marriott Eaton Centre welcomes small groups, whether from out of town or a local office tower. And it's the hotel of choice for weekend shoppers or cultural visitors.

The Marriott philosophy holds that every guest, group and function merits quality treatment. Marriott's Red Coat service gives everyone special, "a la minute" attention.

There are A/V faciities, with last-minute service and equipment available. Business meeting space is on one level, making groups easy to organize. Even the use of Marriott's fine banquet chairs, helps enhance comfort and productivity: no detail is too small.

There is a "No-tipping" bell service policy, and a choice of inexpensive on-site valet parking or self-parking. And security is excellent, keeping guests and their belongings safe.

The restaurant and boardrooms afford a fine view of Trinity Square. And you're close to Toronto's best shopping, restaurants and entertainment.

You'll find The Marriott Eaton Centre Hotel at 525 Bay St., next to the Eaton Centre. For more information, call Leah Leslie at 416-204-9002; or for package details, Heather Jonasson at 416-204-9005. And you can visit the Web site at www.marriotteatoncentre.com

BEVERLY HILLS CATERERS, 20 DANBY AVE., TORONTO

1952 After King George's demise the beautiful young princess becomes Queen Elizabeth 11. Singing in the Rain, wins the Best Film Oscar, and the Canadian dollar is at par! New Canadian designer Jack Ritché opens a Toronto fashion boutique. Fifty years have passed and Ritché is celebrating!

The world has changed and so has Ritché. Over the years the family run business has seen all the trends. Minis, midis and maxis. Simple, elegant, ornate. Brides who want to be princesses and brides who want to be CEOs. Fifty years of fashion shows, celebrities, bridal shows, television interviews, and buying trips.

Today the tradition continues. The three-story salon caters to brides with a greater selection than ever. Mothers who trusted Ritché a generation ago now return with their daughters. The bridal department books appointments that allow the bride plenty of space in her own private room. The consultants are friendly, honest and direct. With nearly one thousand wedding gowns available, they work with the bride to find her the dress that feels just right.

Bridesmaids also have a great selection to choose from, with hundreds of the latest designer styles from Canada and the United States. Mothers and guests select from exciting and glamorous special order and ready-to-wear collections.

Over the past fifty years fashions have changed but the Ritché philosophy has not. Know your customer. Help your customer. Care about your customer. It's a formula that has brought back customers for three generations.

FIFTY YEARS, THOUSANDS OF BRIDES, ONE FAMILY.

Tying the 'knot' involves dressing in formal attire

By ELAINE COHEN
Special to The CJN

We may attend many formal occasions in a lifetime but nothing surpasses the beauty of a formal wedding ceremony. The excitement builds as family members and bridal attendants saunter down the aisle. Finally, all eyes are on the bride radiant in her veil and gown. It took months of planning and it involved meticulous details to arrive at this magical hour.

The Knot Book of Wedding Gowns by Carley Roney distributed by Raincoat Books in Canada is designated for brides. However, anyone interested in social mores and attire will be enthralled with the magnificent photographs, line drawings and enlightening text. In fact, every woman will gain a superior knowledge of fabric, style, pret-a-porter, custom-made and designer apparel after admiring the artwork and reading the stories.

What separates this book from others on the subject is author Carley Roney's professional expertise. Roney is the founder and editor-in-chief of The Knot, a leading media company. Since 1996, The Knot has provided advice to millions of couples a year online at www.theknot.com and in The Knot Wedding Gowns and Weddingpages magazines. She has authored several wedding books and gives advice on the Today show and other national television programs.

The highlight of the book is it's chock full of facts but never boring. By clarifying points for the consumer, the book serves as a confidence-builder. Therefore, when the bride goes out to shop, she knows what to look for. Furthermore, she can always go back to the book and check the name of a fabric, a style or industry jargon. The author educates readers without intimidating or overwhelming them.

Moreover, the book is more than a primer on gowns and a guide to wedding apparel and accessories. Roney takes readers on a guided historical tour tracing wedding attire from ancient times in Egypt until today. In 1840, Queen Victoria of England established the white, worn only once gown as the Western wedding-day ideal.

Chapter two will help any woman buying formal attire, not only a bride. Here we have a comprehensive lesson on the basic details of gown construction. The author includes the silhouette, bodice, neckline, waistline, sleeves, skirt, train, fabric, lace, embellishment, color and dress portraits in her discussion.

"Silhouette refers to the overall cut of a gown," Roney explains. "It's the most essential element to focus on, because a gown's shape is its bedrock – it's what sets the mood for the entire garment."

The neckline guide is equally interesting because Roney points out what flatters particular figures. Roney's overall message is clear. Read and refer to the Internet but remember brides, nothing replaces going into shops and trying on the real thing.

If you intend to call bridal salons beforehand, here are some questions to ask. Do they carry the designers you're interested in? Do they have gowns in your size and price range? Do they carry accessories? How long does it generally take for a dress to come in once it's been ordered? Can the order be rushed, if necessary? Can you see a fabric sample from the dress you're thinking of ordering? Can you get a written alteration estimate when you order your dress?

In addition, to pret-a-porter, Roney devotes a chapter to going couture. She takes brides through all the steps from the consultation and muslin to the fittings and finally the gown. Roney enriches her consumer advice with cultural tidbits. "The history of the veil is culturally diverse, with many interpretations." In Biblical tradition, the custom of veil wearing originated when Rebekah, working in her father's field, covered her head in modesty when she first saw Isaac approaching.

Roney covers the gamut of accessories. Bridesmaids and grooms are also included in the picture. So, whether you want to know the difference between dupioni silk and duchesse satin or learn how to preserve your gown, Roney has the answer.

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 20 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 9 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Wednesday, March 6, 2002 at Sephardic Kehila Centre (Bathurst/Steeles). It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:00 p.m. This year Windsor Bridal will be presenting their 2002 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

'And they assembled together'

Editorial

There could hardly be a more timely message for the Jewish people at this moment in our history than the message of Purim, the holiday that recalls "the month that was transformed for the Jews from one of tragedy to one of happiness, from one of mourning to one of festivity" (Megillah).

Sharice Molko's colourful drawing on this page exquisitely captures that sense of happiness and festivity. The photo of the Israeli Olympic team symbolizes for us the sense of peoplehood we feel with the tiny, beleaguered Jewish State.

As we all know, our forebears in ancient Shushan were the object of irrational, consumptive hatred and malevolent plotting. It was no slight jeopardy they faced.

Haman had masterminded a comprehensive order binding upon the King's constabulary throughout the empire "to destroy and to kill and to slaughter all the Jews, young and old, children and women."

The News in Brief

Canada

Shabbat Vote

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress has written to the Progressive Conservative party of Ontario, asking it to reconsider the scheduling of the vote to replace Mike Harris as party leader and premier. As reported recently in The CJN, the balloting, which is open to all party members, is slated for March 23, a Saturday, meaning Sabbath-observant Jews can't vote. Sabbath-observant Jews also cannot engage in proxy voting, as it is counter to Jewish law. In a letter to PC Party director Jeff Bangs, CJC Ontario region director Bernie Farber noted that "unless certain changes are made prior to the leadership vote, the Conservatives will in fact disenfranchise a significant number of voters within the Jewish community... We would urge your executive committee to take a second look at whether or not it would be feasible, on this occasion, to hold some form of an advance poll or possibly a telephone voting procedure that would permit inclusivity."

Israel

Quits Coalition

JERUSALEM — Israel's One Nation Party has quit the coalition government. The party, which holds two Knesset seats, said it was opposed to the 2002 budget. Party leader Amir Peretz said Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had failed to uphold his commitment to help lower income groups.

Arafat Successors?

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat has named two possible successors. In an interview published Feb. 7 in an Egyptian magazine, Arafat named Ahmed Karia, the speaker of the Palestinian legislative council, and Mahmoud Abbas, Arafat's current deputy. Both are considered advocates of a peace agreement with Israel.

Bomb Shelters

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials want local municipalities to prepare bomb shelters. The development came after the defence establishment concluded that Israel would suffer a retaliatory strike from Iraq if the United States targets the country in its war on terrorism.

Simulated Stargazing

BEERSHEVA — A mobile planetarium for simulated stargazing has been donated to Ben-Gurion University. "Starlab" is an inflatable device that can accommodate 30 children at a time to observe a simulated star-filled sky, for example, or the inside of a human cell.

World

Woman Heads USCJ

WASHINGTON — For the first time, a woman will head North America's Conservative movement. Judy Yudof, 56, was installed last week as president of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism at the group's convention here. There are about 760 Conservative shuls in North America and 320,000 member households.

Clinton to Israel

NEW YORK — U.S. Senator Hillary Clinton is slated to visit Israel later this month. The New York senator initiated the visit to show support for Israel, Ma'ariv reported. During the one-day visit, Clinton is scheduled to receive a security briefing, meet with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and visit a hospital where terror victims are recovering.

Rejects Envoy

LONDON — Iran has rejected the new British ambassador to Tehran, claiming he is a Jew and a spy. Iran's move came after British Prime Minister Tony Blair encouraged Iranian President Mohammad Khatami to accept the appointment of David Reddaway. Britain insists Reddaway is not Jewish and has never worked as a spy.

Praise for Putin

MOSCOW — One of Russia's two chief rabbis has praised President Vladimir Putin's openness after the two met in the Kremlin. Following the Feb. 7 meeting, Rabbi Berel Lazar said he and Putin had discussed various issues of concern to Russian Jewry, including emigration, the return of synagogues to Jewish communities and relations with Jewish communities throughout the world.

Bush Sr. Lauded

PALM BEACH — Former U.S. president George Bush, father of President George W. Bush, was honoured for aiding the immigration of Ethiopian Jews to Israel. On Feb. 7, the elder Bush received the Joseph Prize for Human Rights from the Anti-Defamation League in Palm Beach, Fla., for helping to expedite the emigration of 16,000 Ethiopian Jews in 1991 by offering to mediate in Ethiopia's civil war.

Kosher Kibbles

FORT LAUDERDALE — KosherPets Inc., a Fort Lauderdale-based manufacturer and distributor of gourmet pet foods, has obtained a patent for its kosher product line. A company news release says the kosher pet food is prepared in strict accordance with the laws of kashrut and contains organic and certified kosher ingredients. As well, the food contains no chametz, making it suitable for Passover. KosherPets can be found at www.kosherpets.com.

Sept. 11 Heroes Visit Israel

JERUSALEM — Israel last week paid tribute to police and military officials who took part in rescue efforts following the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States.

A 12-member delegation from the New York Police Department and the U.S. Army arrived here for a week-long visit sponsored by Israel's tourism ministry and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

The group, including 11 men and one woman, received special citations at a Jerusalem news conference and reception.

Delegation members spoke of Israel as a role model for dealing with terror. Lt. Phyllis Byrus of the New York Police Department said Israel offered a positive example for dealing with terror "because people go on living their lives."

Participants met with Israeli government officials, a group of schoolchildren in Jerusalem, and police and other rescue workers. They also visited religious sites and toured northern Israel.

Web site urges violence against religious groups

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress is joining with Muslim and Sikh organizations in asking police to investigate a Web site registered to an Ontario man that urges readers to beat Sikhs and Muslims.

Congress is laying a second complaint on its own that alleges the same Ontario resident runs a Web site that promotes hatred against Jews by directing readers to another site that repeats crude medieval blood libels.

The first complaint, which refers to a site operated by "Tri-City Skins," takes issue with a "picture of the month" that features photos of a Muslim and a Sikh, with arrows pointing at each saying, "This is a Sikh. This is a Muslim. Please beat accordingly." (The picture was removed late last week.)

Congress believes the Tri-City Web page both incites violence and promotes racial hatred, said Ed Morgan, chair of the organization's Ontario region.

"This is as close to an open and shut case as any," he said.

Len Rudner, Congress' director of community relations, said Congress contacted Sikhdharma of Ontario and the Canadian Council of Imams and together the three groups laid a joint complaint to police.

"When the multicultural fabric of the society is attacked, it's an attack on all Canadians, so it's natural that we act together," Rudner said.

Hari Nam Singh Khalsa, president of Sikhdharma of Ontario, a group that represents 125,000 Sikhs, called the Web site "racist, against humanity and deranged.

"This kind of racism and hate literature needs to be stopped. It's against human rights and in this particular situation, it was targeting Muslims and Sikhs and trying to incite violence."

"This page is heinous and may be used by unsavoury elements within our society as a provocation to commit violence," said Imam Abdul Hai Patel of the Canadian Council of Imams.

Rudner said the Tri-City Web site, which claims on its main page to be "powered by hate," is located on a server in the United States, though the host company is registered in Canada. Tri-City likely refers to the Kitchener-Waterloo-Guelph triangle, he added.

Congress has been tracking the individual behind the Web sites since at least September 2001, when the Tri-City site carried a radio interview with William Pierce, author of the Turner Diaries, the racist book that inspired Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh.

The site that is subject to the second complaint, www.aryankindred.com, is also hosted on the same U.S. server. It offers a main page link titled "the Jewish ritual murders." Clicking on the link takes surfers to www.ritualmurder.org, a site apparently hosted by Worldwide Revisionist News.

That site claims "fanatical Hasidic Jews" have practiced human sacrifice since ancient times.

The site also sells Matzah of Zion, the book written by Syrian Defence Minister Mustafa Tlas that accuses Jews of the ritual murder of a Catholic priest in Damascus in 1840.

Parents scout out Israel trips for their kids

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Five Zionist youth groups and a Jewish day school in Winnipeg are represented on an eight-day mission to Israel for Canadian parents, which was scheduled to leave Tuesday.

The mission is a joint initiative of Ora Merin, shlichah at HaShomer Hatzair, and Rotem Ayalon, her counterpart at Habonim Dror. The Toronto-based shlichot, who will accompany the mission, secured funding from the education department of the Jewish Agency for Israel (a beneficiary of local federation funding) to offset much of the cost for the parents.

In addition, El Al provided a reduced fare, Merin said.

The trip was intended to give parents first-hand knowledge of what a youth movement trip for their children would be like. It was designed for parents whose children meet the age requirements for those trips. Participants – who come from Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal – have agreed to speak about their experience when they return.

The hope is that other parents, particularly those who have not made a decision, will then feel more comfortable about sending their own children to Israel.

The trip is a first for Canada, although a small number of similar delegations have gone to Israel from the United States in the past two years, said Adam Minsky, national director of Canada Israel Experience.

The parents will meet with Birthright Israel participants as part of their itinerary. What they experience themselves and hear from young visitors to Israel will have more impact than anything he could say, Minsky told The CJN.

Israel trips will continue "as long as we take all the [security] measures and as long as we can give the best experience," Merin said. "It's still part of our life."

Items in the news

From the editor's desk

Each day, every day, countless items "leap" off the pages of the newspaper. I comment on three of them that struck me as particularly relevant.

On Thursday, Ontario's Deputy Premier and Minister of Finance, Jim Flaherty, publicly presented another plank in the platform of his bid for the leadership of Ontario's Progressive Conservative Party.

He proposed to make homelessness a crime. "Call it tough love if you will. It will be illegal to live on the street; it will be illegal to live in public places... and in the parks," Flaherty was quoted in the National Post.

It was good for Flaherty to introduce the subject of homelessness into his party's leadership contest. But his approach to the solution is highly problematic.

Homelessness, to any extent, but certainly to the extent it has appeared on our streets in recent times, is an indictment of our society. And thus, it should also be an affront to our collective conscience. We must all be moved to try to do something about homelessness, to try to "get the homeless off the streets."

But it is a complicated social problem, one that requires solutions from the social policy realm.

Flaherty himself seemed to understand this when he said at his press conference, "It's good to help people on the streets, to provide blankets. But we need to go a step further and really try to solve this problem and get people the help they need in Ontario and not abandon them to freezing streets."

On the surface, Flaherty's call to "really try to solve this problem" seemed to suggest comprehensive social policy approaches to finding a solution. That is why his embrace of the criminal law was so puzzling and so off the mark.

In most cases, homelessness is a function of poverty, mental illness or a combination of both. But in any of the cases, criminalization is an inappropriate response.

I am not an authority on the subject, but there is no precedent of which I am aware in Jewish history, tradition or values that allows for the criminalization of either poverty or mental illness.

Perhaps Flaherty was misquoted.

On Friday, the premiers and territorial leaders stood at the prime minister's side in Moscow at a wrap-up press conference to a "Team Canada" trade mission in Russia.

The prime minister was asked by a reporter to articulate the federal government's intention about the ratification of the Kyoto agreement regarding industrial pollution and greenhouse effect emissions.

In typically cautious and elliptical fashion, the prime minister staked out a position which was not definitive.

Fearing that he would announce Canada's intention right then and there to move ahead with ratification of the treaty, Premier Ralph Klein of Alberta presented the prime minister with a letter of opposition to ratification of the treaty signed by all the premiers, save Bernard Landry.

The concerns on both sides of the Canadian debate – protecting the environment and protecting the competitiveness of Canadian business – are valid. It stands to reason Canadian policy must try to strike an appropriate balance between the concerns.

But for the premiers to bring the debate to Moscow was unseemly. It is an issue of considerable domestic importance. The proper forum for its debate, therefore, was in Canada, not in Russia.

The practice of politics should not preclude minimal levels of civility and courtesy. Yet the political theatre of federal-provincial relations seems increasingly to be devoid of those minimal levels.

That is a great shame, not only for its own sake, but for the sake, too, of the poor example it sets for the standard of behaviour we want to encourage throughout our society.

On Saturday, the National Post carried a report on the hundreds of thousands of Muslim pilgrims arriving in Mecca, Saudi Arabia for this week's annual Hajj.

"A sea of hajj pilgrims thronged the Grand Mosque, Islam's Holiest shrine... to hear a sermon by the imam, Sheikh Osama Abdullah Khayyat. Sheikh Khayyat steered clear of politics in his speech but closed it with what have become traditional prayers for the triumph of Islam and the defeat of Israel.

"Lord... defeat those tyrant Jews," the sheikh intoned as "he stood by the cube-shaped Kaaba in the heart of the mosque. Muslims around the world turn to Kaaba while praying."

The reporter clearly did not think that the statement by the imam about Israel was a statement about politics. Nor, for that matter, apparently, did the imam. For him, and for the reporter, it was purely and entirely a theological invocation. And we must all be the sadder for it.

To the extent that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is seen as a conflict between religions, it will be virtually impossible to resolve.

With such active incitement by the Saudis and the increasingly more violent role being played by the radical Islamist groups such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah, and now al-Qaeda, too, that is precisely where the conflict is evolving – to a conflict between religions – if it has not already.

Union correspondence reveals backbiting

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto teachers' newsletter and the union that supports it have backtracked on what the Canadian Jewish Congress said were assurances the periodical would carry a response to a controversial article that blamed the United States and Israel for the Middle East conflict, Congress officials say.

Last week, the union executive unanimously confirmed a decision by the editorial board of District 12 Voice (D12 Voice) to reject an article submitted by Congress. The submission, written by CJC director of public policy Simon Rosenblum, addressed the assertions contained in "Why American is Hated," an article that appeared in the December issue of D12 Voice. Rosenblum submitted the article after Jim McQueen, president of district 12 of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation (OSSTF) told Congress spokesman Bernie Farber during a radio talk show that a Congress article would be accepted by the newsletter, Farber said.

But in a subsequent letter to Farber, McQueen stated the assurances he gave on radio were that an alternative viewpoint to the one expressed in the article would be carried, and that priority would first be given to union members' views, followed by those of students and finally, to those of outside sources.

"Due to the furor created by the printing of the article, 'Why America is Hated,' and your organization's activities, the district 12 STBU [board] executive yesterday unanimously confirmed its support of the decisions made by the D12 Voice editorial board as to the content of the upcoming issues of the members' newsletter," McQueen stated in the letter.

Farber rejected McQueen's interpretation of the assurances given on radio, saying the union leader clearly had referred to an article by Congress. He said McQueen's letter shows the union and the newsletter's editorial staff are "annoyed that Congress took them on."

> 'Annoyed that Congress took them on'

"They feel embarassed that the committment was made and they don't like Congress horning in on their territory and exposing the magazine with all its warts. This is their way of punishing us," Farber said.

What's more, internal union correspondence, copied to him by e-mail, reveals a great deal of infighting and blame-shifting among the newsletter's key players, Farber said.

In the first e-mail, D12 editor Doug Little responds to Rosenblum's submission by stating: "I hope we can use it. Keep in mind that the article is very hard on various anti-democratic Arab and Islamic regimes in the Middle East."

Little's letter of rejection to Rosenblum stated: "It did not survive the editorial board meeting, especially since new member Marsha Melnik, a new member on the board, who in general, opposes the article and some of the tone of the Voice, noted that the article was not very good and did the opposition cause more harm than good."

In subsequent unsolicited e-mails, which Farber passed on to The CJN, Little again blamed editorial board member Melnik for the decision to "spike" (reject) the Congress article.

In a letter to McQueen, Little writes, "As I explained at our PD Day, it was Marsha, almost alone, who insisted that the [Congress] article not be run. Ahmed and I at least, maybe more wanted to print the article by Simon Rosenblum. One reason was that you made somewhat of a committment to Bernie Farber on the Coran [sic] show."

That prompted an angry response from Melnik, who, in a letter to McQueen, said, "It is with continued outrage [concerns just doesn't cut it anymore] that I got a copy of Mr. Little's shameful e-mail of Feb. 8."

Blaming him for informing outsiders of the editorial board's private meetings, she states: "He is showing himself to be a coward in trying to lay blame on me. Funny that if it is I who 'killed' the article. I must have so much power, but could not prevent the board from 'killing' my own article." She also called his letter to Rosenblum "embarrassing for all of us."

In yet another letter, she called Little a "coward" and a "bully" and said the real issue that D12 Voice should be addressing is setting guidelines for the operation of the newsletter.

Ed Morgan, chair of Congress' Ontario region, said the union's "acrimonious correspondence" leaves it unclear why Rosenblum's article was killed. "The way the e-mail correspondence reads, it's not flattering on the people who engaged in it. It seems incredibly petty and confused and I thought it behooves educators to express themselves in a more sophisticated way."

Farber said Congress released the correspondence so that "teachers should take a long hard look at whether they want D12 to express their views and values."

McQueen and Little did not return calls.

Thornhill brothers help out NYC firefighters

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — After the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Thornhill brothers Ilan and Leor Mann, wanted the New York City firefighters to know that Canadians were thinking of them.

Ilan, 12, and Leor, 10, sons of Gary and Sarah Mann, not only decided to convert the cost of their birthday presents and parties to cash in order to send to New York, they wrote a poem set to music for the firefighters.

Sarah Mann said that stores such as Toys R Us, Chapters, Indigo and HMV bent their rules and allowed the boys to cash in their gift certificates.

"The boys have learned well the meaning of sharing with others in times of need. We are proud of them for following through with their idea of making a small sacrifice in order to honour those whose courage and concern for others put them in jeopardy," she said.

"We have never experienced such a tragedy; we just felt like we should do something," said Ilan, a Grade 7 student at P.A.C.E. (Academy for Gifted Children).

"I saw families of the victims on television and I thought that if that were us, I would hope they would do something to help," he said.

Leor, who is in Grade 5 at Leo Baeck Hebrew Day School, took the money his family would have spent on a birthday party and included it in the donation. "So many people needed the money, and I did not really need a party."

It is our duty to give when we can, said Ilan. "We have whatever we need."

The Mann brothers sent the following poem on an audio tape featuring Ilan on the guitar and Leor reciting.

The sun has set,
The stars are out,
And the day is almost done,
Brave people are busy,
Helping the victims,
Of the attack on 911.
Now there is no way,
To repay these people,
For their noble deed,
Money cannot repay them,
Freedom is their fee.
You know of whom I speak,
Just look inside the mirror,
And as you do,
Behold the heroes
of the war against terror!

Kidney foundation fund-raiser set

TORONTO — The central Ontario branch of The Kidney Foundation of Canada will hold its annual Spring Gala, one of its largest fund-raisers, April 25 at the Sheraton Centre.

Former premier William Davis will be this year's master of ceremonies and lawyer R. Fraser Elliott will serve as honorary chair. Gala chair Jason Kroft said the organizing committee is especially excited about this year's theme, A New Beginning.

"The focus is on patients and their families," said Kroft. "We wanted to tap into their stories and illustrate the tremendous strides being made in the treatment of kidney-related diseases. Through improved treatment and transplant techniques patients get a new lease on life, a new beginning."

For $175 per person, or $2,000 per table, guests will enjoy a dinner and dance and a live and silent auction. To purchase gala tickets, or to make a donation, please contact event organizer Rachel Katz at 416-445-0373, or by e-mail at rkatz@kidneycob.on.ca

'They assembled together'

As unbelievable as it may sound, there are some people and organizations in this day and age who openly, publicly share Haman's hatred of and aspirations toward Jews. One need look no further than Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, and their benefactors in Iran, Iraq, Syria, the Palestinian Authority (PA) and elsewhere.

Since September 2000, when they were let loose by PA Chairman Yasser Arafat to act upon their callous hatred of Jews and Israel, they have waged relentless war against the Jewish State. Their campaign has become bolder, more sophisticated, more widely waged and, alas, more deadly. Hardly a day has gone by since then that Israelis have not been attacked. Indeed as these words were written, two more teenagers were murdered by a suicide bomber in Karnei Shomron.

By their unceasing violence, Israel's enemies believe they can wear down the morale and the resolve of the Jewish State.

Despite Israel's determination to surrender to Haman's inheritors neither the lives of its people nor its existence, it would be folly to pretend the war being waged against it has not taken a toll. It is a toll measured, first and foremost, in irreplaceable lives, a sense of diminished personal security and a wounded economy. Much like the mood that enveloped our ancestors in ancient Shushan, there is a sense of difficult days ahead throughout the entirety of the Jewish people.

But our ancestors overcame the hatred aimed at them, exposed the deadly plot, vanquished the plotter and defeated his malign confederates. And we – the entirety of the Jewish people – will do the same.

The Megillah recounts no fewer than five occasions when Jews "assembled together," wherever they were, to act in defence of their lives. These frequent references to communal cohesion and collective purpose were not merely literary devices intended to enhance the drama of the story. They were unambiguous instructions to the generations that followed.

More than 2,500 years later, we must act on those instructions. Today, we in the Diaspora must demonstrate the same understanding of common cause and commitment to one another that our forebears did in ancient Shushan.

We too must assemble together in defence of Jewish lives, in defence of a Jewish future, in defence of Israel. We must do so at every opportunity and at every hour of need. We must do so privately and publicly wherever calumnies are spread about the Jewish State. We must do so metaphorically and literally.

At this moment in our history, on the eve of Purim, as we contemplate the happiness of the holiday, it is imperative we assemble together in festivity and celebration but also, especially, in defence of Israel.

An opportunity to literally assemble together on behalf of the Jewish state arises at the CIC Parliamentary Dinner in Ottawa on March 6. Canadians should attend the conference to overflowing. We must show our federal government and members of Parliament that our common cause with Israel is unshakable.

Arafat is not a worthy peace partner

Sheldon Kirshner ("Yasser Arafat faces his moment of truth," CJN, Feb. 14) gives a well-reasoned historical analysis leading up to the present state of Israeli-Palestinian tension but then concludes the article by saying that Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat must now prove that he is a worthy peace partner. If Kirshner had read his own article, it would be clear that Arafat has consistently proved that he is not a worthy peace partner. If both Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and U.S. President George W. Bush have effectively dismissed Arafat, why would Kirshner even dream of giving him another chance? It is time for Kirshner to take a realistic look at Israel's options for peace.

Leftists terminally delusional

In Sheldon Kirshner's column in the Feb. 14 issue of The CJN, the author writes that Arafat is facing his moment of truth. He ends his column with the observation that "Arafat needs to demonstrate that he is prepared to smash the terrorist infrastructure." This after informing us of other "troubling" things Arafat has done. It is clear Arafat has disappointed him.

Kirshner is still talking about Arafat's need to demonstrate his commitment to peace, about the Palestinians' just grievances and the fact that there is "some merit" to Arafat's point that Israel needs to make significant concessions.

If Kirshner read the mainstream Arab and PA newspaper, he would know the main grievance of "the Arab street" is and has always been the very existence of the State of Israel.What they want more than anything is to kill Jews, not just in Israel, but "wherever you can find them," as one imam put it.

I know this goes against everything that the terminally delusional leftist camp believes, but it's true.

Why can't Kirshner and other like-minded thinkers believe this? Why isn't the fact that the media Arafat controls continues to pump out pure anti-Semitic hatred from morning to night, a reliable clue as to what Arafat's real intentions are? You should know a murderer by now when you see one. It's not that complicated, really – he is the enemy. He will always be the enemy.

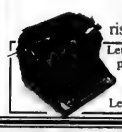
Join the Ontario P.C. party

The Jewish community has been lobbying successive provincial governments for decades to address the discriminatory funding of schools in Ontario. Many members of the Jewish community have been buckling under the burden of high tuition fees for decades. We finally have a government that has paid attention to our community's concerns, and has come up with a solution, albeit not a perfect one, to the problem.



This initiative came not without political risk to the Progressive Conservative party. A race is in progress to choose the party's next provincial leader. As a token of our community's gratitude, and as insurance that this tax credit will continue into the future, it behooves our community to support those particular leadership candidates who have helped us by instituting this tax credit, and who are most in favour of this tax credit.

We therefore urge parents and other concerned members of the community to join the Ontario P.C. party. The election takes place on Saturday, March 23. Unfortunately, the Conservative Party has resisted scheduling an advanced poll for those who cannot vote on Shabbat, but negotiations are ongoing, and it is still hoped that a solution might be found.

In any case, whether or not we will be able to vote, it is advisable to join the party and express our support for those candidates that support the tax credit.

Support the initiative that will benefit our community in the order of $30 million a year. Our failure to do so may jeopardize efforts to address the one issue that has for years been at the top of our political agenda.

A Rhodes experience

Thanks for your story on Rhodes, Greece (CJN, Jan. 17). In the early summer of 1973, after spending a year backpacking through Europe, I arrived on the beautiful island of Rhodes. I found a very inexpensive pension in the old town. The first night in a room shared with other young travellers, I made a very interesting discovery. On the right side of my door post was the distinct white marking of a mezuzah, impossible to miss because it contrasted with the blue paint of the door. After inquiring, I found out I was living in the heart of the old Jewish Quarter. The owner of the pension, though not Jewish, had a large framed picture of Anne Frank in her living room.

About a 30-second walk from the pension was a small square with a fountain of seashores – a memorial to the Jews of Rhodes who died in the Holocaust.

Also very close by was the Rhodes synagogue run by a man named Moishe. He invited me in and after a few visits, I made a very detailed pencil sketch of the synagogue's interior. On one such visit, Moishe and his wife invited me to their home for a delicious traditional Greek lunch. One Friday night, I went to a service with a Swedish girl from my pension. A woman started to sing in a beautiful voice, songs in a language I couldn't understand. It was neither Hebrew, nor Greek, but what I found out many years later, Ladino.

After six glorious weeks of sketching and painting, I left Rhodes for Athens. In the summer of 1982, I returned to the island only to find the synagogue closed. With tensions in the Middle East at that time, I was concerned for Moishe, his family and the synagogue. I am very pleased to read that the synagogue is open to tourists. I have never forgotten my truly memorable Jewish experience in Rhodes.

Jews must recreate Zionism as a proud, living organism

By ZAC KAYE

I had the pleasure of being with 30 students at the World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS) Conference in and around Jerusalem in late December. It was wonderful to feel their sense of connection, their pride and comfort at being in Israel and their passion for the country that is not their home yet in so many ways is.

Being with our students and sitting in on many of the conference's sessions, I began to reflect on some of the core issues many have written about lately. Both in Israel and in the Diaspora, much has been written about the place of Israel in our lives and, more importantly, what has happened to that once-proud ideology of Zionism.

How do these issues relate to young North American Jews today, if at all? What have the events in Durban and the second intifadah done to shape Diaspora Jewry's relationship with Israel?

Many of us who are educators are acutely aware that with the passage of time, our young people are becoming more distant from the excitement of the creation of the Jewish State and of, for example, the euphoria of the Six Day War. This generation is, as many have described them, the children of the intifadah. Their images and memories of Israel as portrayed on the nightly news are negative views of a mighty power responding with bullets to the stones of poor, defenceless Palestinian children. This generation remembers the assassination of a prime minister who believed in peace, and of the ultimate, cynical failure of the peace process and the return of violence.

The debate about Zionism and its virtual disappearance as a core ideology of Diaspora Jewry is not just about young people being embarrassed to stand proud as supporters of Israel. It is a much deeper debate about the very nature of Jewish life in the Diaspora.

During the summer, as I recuperated from what turned out to be a more serious operation than I thought, I took the opportunity to read a number of books on the history of the Zionist movement. In his biography of Chaim Weizmann, The Making of a Statesman, Yehuda Reinharz brought home to me, as I see them, the core issues of the dilemma we now find ourselves in as we attempt to define our relationship with Israel, and as Israelis define their relationship with us.

Reinharz describes in detail how, in the World War I period, Weizmann and his fellow European Zionists struggled with American Zionists such as Louis Brandeis and Felix Frankfurter in advancing the Zionist ideal. What emerges is the different direction that North American Zionism was to take compared to that of Europe. Reinharz paints a picture of Zionists in North America in 1918: passionate about the creation of a Jewish home in Palestine but nevertheless intent on rebuilding their lives after the war. They were competing with a post war recession and the continuing struggle of many Jews to succeed in North America.

The North American Jewish emphasis on fund-raising does not diminish the central role that they were to play in developing and supporting the Yishuv, and eventually, the nascent State of Israel. However, for the majority of North American Jews, their role was at odds with the ideology of Zionism as expressed by Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion. Ben-Gurion, a pragmatist, was totally aware, through his fund-raising work in North America, what North American Jewry could do for the Yishuv. But this did not stop him from repeatedly speaking of the need for massive western aliyah to help build the Jewish homeland. He fervently believed that the major role of Zionism was to bring about the end of the Diaspora experience and create in Israel a "normal" society.

With the creation of the State of Israel, the Zionist movement had fulfilled its task. The job now was to support the country, provide for impoverished immigrants and ensure that Israel would not become politically isolated. If the goal of Zionism was fulfilled and being a "lover of Zion" was to remain an important part of life in North America, then the efforts of the combined appeal under the federation banner fit perfectly into a notion of what has become known as "civic Judaism." Jews could share vicariously in the building of the state; they could campaign for other communities to move to Israel – particularly Soviet Jewry – without having to move themselves.

If Ben-Gurion had set aliyah as the highest ideal of Zionism, then western Jewry didn't respond as he would have hoped. Instead, most chose to build their lives in the Diaspora. Aliyah remained the highest of ideals for only a relative minority of Jews, most of whom were the more religiously committed. Or, as we are seeing at the moment with the crisis in Argentina, for troubled communities seeking refuge.

It is within this context that I believe young people struggle with the notion of an identity with Israel. The vast majority of Jews in North America have grown up, I believe, as "lovers of Zion" – not as Zionists. They are passive participants in the growth and development of Israel, but not active stakeholders. Therefore, it is the very notion of what we mean by the Zionist movement, or rather, the Israel-Diaspora relationship, that has to be redefined.

The assimilationist trend that had been part of North American life since the end of World War II, if not before, was to be highlighted in a dramatic manner in the 1990 population study conducted by the Council of Jewish Federations (today known as United Jewish Communities). The study created great controversy and consternation with its dramatic findings, most particularly, the figure for the intermarriage rate: over 50 per cent.

The concern resonated equally in different parts of Canada. The need to do something dramatic in response was important. The creation of Birthright Israel was one such response. This 10-day, free trip, given the name "birthright" by its cofounders Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, has magically engaged many thousands of young people in a relationship with their own Jewishness and with Israel. However, if this is to be a meaningful experience beyond a temporary "love-in" with Israel, then a greater investment is needed in programs and initiatives upon their return to North America.

Canadian "birthrighters" arriving in Israel earlier this year.

We live in an age of individualism: many young Jewish people look to do their own thing, to create their own sense of community. Many are drawn to social action programs and initiatives and have a grave concern for the future of this planet. In our educational construct, we have to be aware of this and tailor our initiatives accordingly. We have to excite them as McGill University professor Gil Troy and others have with the profound message that is Zionism, however we define it.

We also have to be aware that Birthright Israel is an experience, not a movement. We have to speak to all segments of our young adult population – those who have been fortunate to visit Israel once or many times, those who have participated in Birthright, and those who have yet to go on that program or others.

The way we define Zionism in 2002, and the challenges that we create, must speak to where young Jewish adults are in their lives. In their desire to build a Jewish society that was self-sufficient and related to the land, the early Zionists – the chalutzim – were no different in many ways from many of today's young adults who are seeking innovative ways of expressing themselves Jewishly.

Today, many volunteer opportunities combine Israeli and Third World experiences (such as Habitat for Humanity) and build relationships across ethnic and cultural divides. It used to be a popular choice for graduating students to spend a year in Israel working in development towns. They would work with the disadvantaged, the disabled, the disenfranchised on such programs as Otzma and Kafiada. We need to re-engage youth with these kinds of opportunities in a major way or, if necessary, create new and more relevant ones.

In North America, many initiatives exist to attract young Jews to social- action projects. Why not combine them with a serious Israel component? Jewish Campus Services works closely with Ve'ahavta and American Jewish World Service in developing such opportunities.

We are at a critical point in the Israel-Diaspora relationship; the community cannot take for granted the allegiance and commitment of young people. Israel and the Diaspora communities have to work much harder to redefine and, if necessary, create a Zionism that speaks to our young people in a language they understand. This is no less true in Israel, where many Israeli young adults see no relevance to the Diaspora and see themselves as Israelis, not as Jews.

We cannot change how Zionism developed in North America or how Israel related to the Diaspora following the creation of the state. But we have to find ways of working together to redefine or create a Zionism that is a proud, living organism – one that is of mutual benefit to all of us who seek a meaningful relationship between Israel and the Diaspora, particularly for our young people.

Zac Kaye is the executive director of Jewish Campus Services in Toronto.

The ultimate catchword

In his recent state of the union address, U.S. President George W. Bush specifically named Iraq, Iran and North Korea and condemned them as "rogue states." It was no surprise that Iraq responded by dismissing the accusation as a product of "American Zionist" inspiration.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In the Middle East, and occasionally in some other parts of the world, the term "Zionist" has taken on a special meaning. It no longer refers merely to a particular policy, but has become a catchword for "Jewish." The avoidance of the term "Jewish" is clear: the user hopes to sidestep the accusation of anti-Semitism by speaking of "Zionists" instead of Jews in general.

But it turns out that it has not really helped. There once was a distinction between opposition to Zionist policy on the one hand and one's attitude toward Jews in general. The anti-Semites have managed to wipe this out. They can now – so they imagine – flail away at "Zionists" when in fact their attack is directed against Jews in general. By this play with words, they hope to escape the accusation of anti-Semitism, but their practice has become so translucent that no one is fooled any more.

Anyone who takes the trouble to read anti-Semitic literature knows that anti-Semitism is back to where it was in its heyday some 100 years ago. Jews are depicted as inherently unreliable, potentially criminal, and in general, an undesirable element in the human family. There was a time, of course, when one could say this and get away with it, but the popularity of anti-Semitism has waned and has been relegated to the backrooms of political whispering.

People who formerly had no hesitation to call themselves anti-Semitic now avoid that terminology and hide behind "anti-Zionism." In doing so, they have changed their coat but not their character, and it is well to know with whom we are dealing when we read the double-edged vocabulary.

In fact, in some parts of the world, the old anti-Semitism has now become outright anti-Judaism. Thereby it can often be identified with the traditional anti-Semitism that was brought to its dismal flowering in the days of Hitler.

The game of using certain catchwords as a cover for one's real intent is not new, and "anti-Zionism" has, for some decades already, meant "anti-Semitism."

It is my hope that fewer and fewer people will be deceived by this double-talk and know whereof the writer speaks. The dismal policy of anti-Semitism raises its ugly head from time to time in various parts of the world. We need not be unduly afraid of it, but we have to expose it when we see it. Fortunately, there is enough support out there for decency and truth.

The soldiers' story

I'm ambivalent about the refusal of more than 200 Israeli reservists to serve in the West Bank and Gaza. While I oppose the decision by individual soldiers to refuse to serve or to obey orders, this soldiers' story is more complex. It inhabits that difficult, grey area of the existential dilemmas of a democracy forced into an occupying, policing role against civilian resistance and an ongoing threat of terrorism.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

To begin with, the 50 reservists who first wrote the letter are neither pacifists nor classic objectors. They all wish to continue to serve in their elite, combat units, but they draw the line at service in the territories, which they describe as defense of the settlements rather than the state. They argue that the army's practices in the territories perpetuate the occupation and violate the rights of civilians living in those areas.

As such, they are "selective objectors," and pose a different kind of legal and moral challenge than conscientious objectors who refuse to serve altogether.

In addition, these are reserve soldiers from the centre of the political and social map, who represent the best of Israel's citizens' army. Unlike compulsory recruits in active service, these men move back and forth between civilian lives and military duties. As the commander of Israel's southern command, Gen. Doron Almog, said recently, their motivation to serve is more mature and sober. If they speak out publicly, they reflect a deeper crisis that cannot be ignored.

This incident stands out in Israel's military history. Reserve soldiers have been a significant moral voice in the past, but usually through protest demonstrations once they've returned from the lines. The most famous of these was the public stance taken by reservists during the 1982 Lebanon War, but such voices were heard as early as 1973.

A second phenomenon has been "grey objection," in which reserve soldiers ask for local reassignment. Field commanders usually handle such cases quietly and locally, thereby disguising the numbers. Very few reservists have been public in their refusal to serve, even during the first intifadah 15 years ago.

The strain on military resources over the last 18 months has forced the IDF to assign more reserve units to the West Bank and Gaza. As a result, over the last few months alone, there have been more reservist objectors than over the last 10 years. Yoram Peri, a senior fellow at the United States Institute for Peace and a leading Israeli expert on the military and society, believes that if the conflict with the Palestinian Authority continues to escalate, this trend is likely to grow. If this happens, it will become a central factor in Israeli decision-making.

Not surprisingly, less than 20 per cent of the Israeli public considers refusing to serve to be an appropriate way to protest IDF policy. But the IDF's leadership understands the more subtle challenge posed by the reservists and is concerned about potential broader support for their position. They know that the reservists have hit the heart of the matter: Israel cannot continue to police the territories and contend with the intifadah without affecting the civilian population in those areas. The issue is not the legality of orders – which would generally stand the test of law – but the fundamental dissonance between a sophisticated fighting machine and civilian resistance.

In a recent forum on the military and society at the Israel Democracy Institute, several generals were surprisingly open about the need to engage in a dialogue with the reservists. At the very least, the IDF will have to be more sensitive to their accusations in its orders to soldiers on the ground. For their part, the reservists have, thus far, refused to speak to foreign journalists. They view this as a painful, yet necessary, debate, but they also see it as an internal Israeli matter.

The reservists' letter can be viewed facilely as evidence of Israel's weakening resolve. I see it differently. Israel's greatest challenge has been to reconcile its commitment to democracy with its commitment to security. At critical moments in its life, citizens have sounded warning bells against the inevitable tendency to overlook the responsibilities of morality and humanity, even when those are weighed against the overwhelming imperatives of security. This is Israel's strength. As difficult as the challenge may be, I rue the day when such voices will not be heard.

Sept. 11 and the Jews

In the immediate aftermath of Sept. 11, it seemed almost obscene for analysts to explore the impact the tragedy had on Jews and Jewish interests. This was an American, a universal, tragedy: citizens of all faiths, ethnic and racial groups, and dozens of nationalities perished in the event. Western civilization was the target.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Nevertheless, many Jews certainly thought that after Sept. 11, Americans would at last understand how Israelis have felt. And since both Israel and America were now united against terror, this would lead to greater American support for Israel. To an extent this has occurred, as seen from the American government's pressure on Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and the PLO to curb terrorism.

But as the months have passed, reflection on the attack's impact on North American Jews seems in order. A series of recent articles in the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz raised a number of these issues.

One impact has been the reintegration of New York – with its large Jewish population and its symbolic status as ultra-liberal, cosmopolitan "Jew York" City – back into the American heartland. This American tragedy took place largely – but not only – in this most Jewish of cities.

Indeed, the targeting of New York's financial district was, in lawyer Alan Dershowitz's view, an anti-Semitic strike by the terrorists at perceived Jewish power. However, the attack on New York occuring in conjunction with the attack on the Pentagon served to tie, in subliminal fashion, the destiny of American Jews to the fate of America.

True, the new mayor of New York is a Jewish billionaire, Michael Bloomberg. But Bloomberg has received previous mayor Rudy Giuliani's blessing. Since Sept. 11, inter-group tensions have been muted in the Big Apple.

In short, the attack on America was an attack on New York, and both were attacks on American Jews. Those attacks both increased and decreased the Jewish tie to the United States. On the one hand, a poll showed American Jews, by a three-to-one ratio, felt the attack strengthened their American identity rather than their Jewish identity.

But for every security, there is a Jewish insecurity. The attacks also made North American Jews feel vulnerable. Even as media attention focused on a besieged and frightened Arab/Muslim community, and possible backlash – most of which did not materialize – Jews felt uneasy. This latest unease had started with the collapse of the Oslo peace process and the renewed violence of the intifadah.

The concern in some media and intellectual circles with the so-called "root causes" of Sept. 11 would, as many Jews knew all too well, lead to the Middle East conflict. How long before pundits and adversaries would begin to make the connection between American foreign policy, Israeli "intransigence" or the "occupation" and hostility towards America in so much of the world?

The North American campus scene was already replete with highly mobilized pro-Palestinian groups demonizing Israel. Many Jewish students still want to keep a low profile. Some feel that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is not blameless for the current impasse, even as they recognize the responsibility of both Arafat and the more extreme terrorist groups.

Moreover, North American Jews know that if the terrorists attack again, they may not be spared. Already reports have emerged that one cell was targeting Outremont in Montreal because of its large and visible Chassidic population.

So far, the war in Afghanistan has gone well. But if the conflict should widen for any reason, Jews would feel ever more insecure. Canadian Jews will be in an even more dicey position if America takes military measures and Canada, for whatever reason, decides not to co-operate as it has so far.

It has become conventional wisdom to say that the world has not been the same since Sept 11. That is certainly true for the world of North American Jews. Jews stand shoulder to shoulder with Americans and their allies engaged in the fight against terror. But they look over their shoulder as well.

The Kirshner File

U.S. moves closer to war with Iraqi regime

What's next?

Now that the war in Afghanistan has wound down, save for mopping up operations, the United States has begun to shift its attention to other countries that support, harbour or sponsor terrorists. With the Taliban government and the Al Qaeda terrorist network in Afghanistan having been, respectively, obliterated and incapacitated, Washington is considering its options.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"Afghanistan is just the beginning of the war against terrorism," President George W. Bush said recently. "We will not be secure as a nation until all these threats are defeated."

In a curtain-raiser of what we may expect, the United States has dispatched some 700 troops to the Philippines – a predominantly Catholic country – to assist the Philippine army to eradicate the small Abu Sayyaf movement. Supposedly linked to Al Qaeda, Abu Sayyaf is dedicated to establishing an Islamic state in that east Asian nation.

In tandem with this operation, the United States is pressing Yemen, the ancestral home of Osma bin Laden, to crack down on suspected Al Qaeda cells. A country riven by tribal cleavages and still recovering from the 1994 civil war, Yemen is where the U.S.S. Cole battleship was attacked in 2000 by bin Laden operatives, killing 17 American sailors.

The Bush administration is also casting an eye at Somalia, a failed state on the Horn of Africa and the site of the infamous 1993 "Blackhawk Down" incident. Somalia is home to Al Itihadd al-Islamiya, a Muslim fundamentalist group with ties to Al Qaeda, which, the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) has warned, is trying to reconstitute itself.

But the Philippines, Yemen and Somalia are mere sideshows compared to Iraq, a terrorist state according to the U.S. State Department.

Convinced that Saddam Hussein's Iraq remains the paramount enemy, now and in the future, the Bush administration has begun singling out Baghdad as the next real target in the ongoing war against international terrorism.

Call it unfinished business.

Defeated in the 1991 Gulf War – the "mother of all battles," as Saddam himself put it– and subjected to United Nations economic sanctions, Iraq is a bone in the throat of the United States.

Although United Nations weapons inspectors obliterated much of Iraq's armoury – even more than the allied aerial bombing campaign did – the task was never really completed.

Fed up by Iraq's prevarications and devious stalling tactics, the inspectors pulled out in December 1998, setting the stage for a four-day American and British bombing blitz of Iraq.

Since then, however, Iraq has been free to rehabilitate its armed forces, upgrade its covert chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programs and develop its long-range missile capability. By doing so, Iraq brazenly flouts United Nations resolutions.

These fearsome weapons of mass destruction, the bane of Iraq's neighbours, including Israel, are currently at the centre of a fierce debate in Washington about Iraq.

The discussion centres on whether the United States should defer to misgivings by allied countries and refrain from attacking Iraq. Britain and Canada – Washington's staunchest allies – as well as Germany, France, Russia and China all prefer a political strategy to deal with Iraq.

The Arab League and Arab states, from Egypt to Saudi Arabia, also favour that approach, as do United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan and NATO's secretary-general, Lord Robertson.

They argue there is no compelling evidence linking Iraq to the Sept. 11 destruction of the World Trade Center in Manhattan, the defining event that touched off the war in Afghanistan. Indeed, no such "smoking gun" exists. Israeli military intelligence has found no connection between Iraq and the 19 Arab hijackers who slammed two commercial airliners into the World Trade Center.

The CIA agrees. On Feb. 5, it acknowledged that Iraq has not engaged in terrorist operations against the United States in almost a decade, since Iraq's abortive attempt to assassinate former president George Bush, George W.'s father, in Kuwait in 1993.

The CIA, too, scoffs at the notion that a meeting in Prague between an Iraqi intelligence officer and Mohamed Atta, a suspected leader of the hijacking teams, links Iraq to Sept. 11.

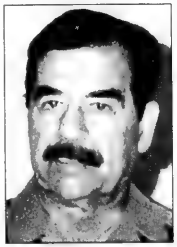
The CIA's greatest concern is that Iraq has been able to develop its chemical, biological and nuclear programs in an unfettered fashion since the departure of United Nations inspectors nearly four years ago.

Having concluded that Iraq had no verifiable role in last September's atrocities, the United States is focusing on Iraq's cache of weapons of mass destruction as a rationale for unseating Saddam. As Bush's national security advisor, Condoleezza Rice, put it last November: "We didn't need Sept. 11 to tell us that (Iraq) is a threat to our interests." Bush's spokesperson, Ari Fleischer, has been just as emphatic: "Saddam Hussein presented problems for the United States prior to Sept. 11."

Taking his cue from their comments, John Bolton, U.S. undersecretary of state for arms control, told a recent UN conference that since 1998, Iraq has improved "all phases of its offensive biological weapons program."

Bush, on Nov. 25, took the campaign to a new level when he warned Saddam that he will face serious consequences unless he allows UN inspectors to resume their work. Iraq is not likely to accede to his demand.

On Jan. 29, Bush returned to the same theme when he charged that Iraq, along with Iran and North Korea, constitute an "axis of evil" by dint of their efforts to build weapons of mass destruction. "I will not wait on events, while dangers gather," he declared, in the clearest indication yet that the United States is preparing the ground for a massive military campaign in Iraq.



Saddam Hussein

Secretary of State Colin Powell, normally a voice of caution regarding Iraq, turned up the pressure on Feb. 7 when he reiterated that the United States is contemplating a "regime change" in Baghdad.

Last December, Powell said the objective of U.S. policy is to overthrow Saddam, who became president through a 1979 coup d'etat.

Powell's comments notwithstanding, the leading advocate in the American government for ousting Saddam is Paul Wolfowitz, the deputy secretary of defence.

Four months before Sept. 11, he declared: "There will be no peace in the region and no safety for our friends there… as long as he remains in power."

Among Wolfowitz's allies in the Bush administration are Donald Rumsfeld, the secretary of defence, and Vice-President Dick Cheney, who will try to line up Arab support for an offensive against Iraq when he visits the Middle East next month.

In addition, Wolfowitz can count on the backing of Henry Kissinger, the former secretary of state; Harold Brown and James Schlesinger, the secretaries of defence under Jimmy Carter; James Woolsey, the ex-director of the CIA; Richard Perle, a senior official in the Reagan administration, and David Jeremiah, the former deputy chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

More important, perhaps, U.S. congressional leaders are behind Wolfowitz's Iraqi doctrine. On Dec. 5, in a letter to Bush, they observed: "For as long as Saddam Hussein is in power in Baghdad, he will seek to acquire weapons of mass destruction and the means to deliver them."

Leon Fuerth, a national security advisor to former vice-president Al Gore, hammered home that point in an op-ed piece in The New York Times. "He (Saddam) is a permanent menace to his region and to the vital interests of the United States. He and his government must be ripped out of Iraq…"

According to various reports, Wolfowitz and his acolytes are formulating a strategy for a post-Saddam era in Iraq. Under the plan, the United States would occupy northern and southern Iraq in conjunction with the disaffected Kurds and Iraqi opposition forces led by the Iraqi National Congress. With these territorial bases in hand, the United States would put the squeeze on Saddam's power base in central Iraq.

As a survivor who has headed off at least a dozen U.S.-supported coup attempts in the past decade, Saddam would fight back ferociously, even launching chemically and biologically-tipped warheads at Israel.

Although he has a much larger army and air force than the Taliban ever possessed, he can nevertheless be overthrown if sufficient firepower and commitment are brought to bear.

Saddam's evil, repressive regime can be eradicated. Like the Taliban, he is ultimately a paper tiger.

Jewish Life

Esther: going beyond the biblical text

By RABBI SHARON SOBEL

Rabbinic Reflections

When I was three, four and five years old, my mother dressed me as a hamantasch for Purim. She would cut two large triangles from corrugated cardboard, decorate them to look like the front and back sides of a hamantasch, thread string through them and put them over my head sandwich-board style. She would also make a triangular hamantasch hat and tie it around my neck with a string.

As Purim approached, I would begin to dread that hamantasch costume. I hated it. I thought I looked silly, it was uncomfortable and who wanted to be a hamantasch anyway? I longed to dress up as Queen Esther. For me, Esther epitomized the ideal heroine – beautiful, brave, courageous, a queen, and on top of all that, a saviour of her people. When I was six, my mother made a Queen Esther costume for me and I was ecstatic. I lovingly wore that same costume every year until I became too old to dress up as Queen Esther.

Each Purim, many girls love to dress up as Queen Esther, their Jewish heroine. Jewish girls don't have very many biblical role models. The few women we see in the Torah are mostly discussed in the context of their relationships with key male characters and their roles as sisters, wives and mothers. Moreover, most of their stories centre around their ability or inability to procreate. It seems their only important contribution is their offspring.

Because the Bible does not give us a complete picture of women and their roles, and since we rarely hear about them apart from their roles as sister, wife or mother, we tend to cling to women who appear to be strong, independent and have contributed something unique to the Jewish people. Esther, at first glance, seems to be such a woman, and she is one of only two women who have a book named after her.

Many have declared Esther a heroine and a positive role model for Jewish girls. Even the rabbis of old credit her with extraordinary characteristics and qualities. The Talmud (Megillah 15a) says God's holy spirit accompanied her when she went to see King Achashverosh to begin the process of saving her people. This midrash elevates Esther to the status of prophetess – someone endowed with ruach hakodesh, the holy spirit. And because God's spirit was with her, the rabbis say, all of her future actions were sanctioned from above.

There are many more Talmudic and midrashic tales that show the rabbis see Esther as powerful, strong and independent. They attribute great courage and authority to her and portray her not only as a saviour, but also as a halachic authority and a great political figure.

The rabbis look far beyond the actual text of the Book of Esther to create this powerful heroine, since it only shows her to be Mordechai's puppet, unable to make decisions unless prodded to do so. The Megillah's real hero is Mordechai.

The rabbis should be given a great deal of credit for writing midrashim that depict Esther in such a powerful manner. It is these early rabbis who tried to show that, perhaps, the Book of Esther's portrayal of Esther is androcentric, skewed and not totally appropriate as a Jewish feminist heroine. It is this rabbinic image of Esther that has been handed down to our children and has inspired those dissatisfied with the feminine role models in our Jewish tradition.

If we want our children to see Esther as an appropriate role model, we need to do as the rabbis of old: we need to go beyond the text itself to teach the midrashim the rabbis wrote about her, and we need to write our own as well. (We also need to listen to another silent, female voice in the text, the voice of Vashti. Vashti should get more credit for sticking up for herself.)

Yes, Esther saved the Jewish people, but the credit, at least according to the Megillah, really belongs to Mordechai. Maybe my mother knew what she was doing all those years ago when she insisted that I dress up as a hamantasch and not as Queen Esther.

Commemorating the Struma, 60 years later

Guest Voice

By BARUCH COHEN

There is not a single page in our calendars that does not call to memory thousands of our brothers and sisters, tortured and killed.

We will keep commemorating our sisters and brothers as long as we live. If we did not remember them, we would become accomplices of those who would like to kill them a second time, or of those who write doctoral theses alleging that the Holocaust was imagined or that the Struma story is a lie.

In December 1941, 769 Jews, among whom were over 100 children, boarded an old 180-ton cattle boat called the Struma in the port of Constanta, Romania. Their destination: Eretz Yisrael. The boat was unsafe, terribly overcrowded and lacking sanitary facilities.

The passengers were Jewish citizens of Romania who did not want to be abused, humiliated, tormented, spat at, robbed and killed. They pinned their last hopes on the floating wreck that was the Struma, hoping to reach the Promised Land. That road, the sea road to Eretz Yisrael, would bring them to their national home, the new-old homeland for them and for Jews from all over the world.

After the Bucharest "Kristallnacht" on Jan. 21-23, 1941 came the massacre of over 10,000 Jews in the city of Iasi on June 29, 1941. In autumn 1941, mass deportations started of the entire Jewish population from northern Moldova, Bessarabia and Bukovina, into an area called Transnistria (Ukraine).

The Jews aboard the Struma planned to sail to Istanbul and then obtain immigration visas for Eretz Yisrael. The Turkish authorities, however, adamantly refused to grant permission to transfer the would-be immigrants to a transit camp on land until the resumption of their voyage. The High Commissioner of Palestine, Sir Harold MacMichael, opposed granting immigration visas to the boat's passengers. And so the Struma, forced to leave port, went down in the Black Sea on Feb. 24, 1942, drowning all, save one, of its passengers.

We owe it to ourselves to remember. But above all, we owe it to our children, and to our children's children.

Baruch Cohen is research chair at the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research in Montreal.

The Death Ship
By Ruth Whitman

The Struma.
It lay in the harbor at Istanbul without food or coal.

Don't let it land,
said the Ambassador.

Jews are enemy aliens,
said the British.
Tow them out to the Black Sea,
send them to Crete, Mauritius,
to Rumania, Germany, Jamaica,
but don't let them come to Palestine.

That was December 1941.

Safe in my kibbutz at Sdot Yam
(meadows of the sea),
I looked at the peacock-blue Mediterranean and cried, let them come,
we have room.

No, said Lord Moyne,
if one ship comes they'll all want to come.

Let the children come.

Children?
What will we do with children?

The hold was airless.
Sickness, filth,
layers of excrement, vomit.
The ship could not sail.
The ship could not stay.
No land would take them.

In February the ship exploded outside the harbor at Istanbul.
Eight hundred lives flew up, their rags, arms, legs, hopes, falling like rain.

One was saved.
He was allowed to enter
Palestine.

Ruth Whitman teaches poetry at Radcliffe College and at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The Death Ship was published in Blood to Remember: American Poets on the Holocaust (Texas Tech University Press, 1991).

Mishloach manot – part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Purim is almost here and that means it's time to prepare your mishloach manot, the traditional treats sent out to celebrate the happy holiday. Here are some ideas from the World Wide Web.

Yaffa Klugerman's A Tisket, A Tasket, Let's Make a Purim Basket is full of helpful hints, including themed gifts such as breakfast baskets, tea baskets, deli platters, a falafel theme and a colour theme: "Buy or prepare everything that is one colour. For example, buy grapes, purple candies, grape juice, and make hamantaschen with blueberry filling. Don't forget to add a note wishing everyone a 'grape Purim.'" She concludes with this piece of advice: "The two most important rules of mishloach manot packaging? Make sure it's easily packable and easily stackable. I found this out the hard way, when I stayed up till 3 a.m. one year taping cellophane paper on straw baskets. The next day, many of them fell apart after I placed them in a shopping bag to be delivered." [http://www.jfl mail.com/old/Holidays/klugerman1.htm]

Although most mishloach manot baskets are stuffed with store-bought, sugar-laden candies, there are some creative alternatives. Beit HaChatulim, a Jewish vegetarian homeschool in Sharon, Mass., fills its baskets with hamantaschen, marshmallow brownies, caramel popcorn, apple bread and something called dingbats (dates, pecans and Rice Crispies). You can find recipes for these goodies at their site [http://www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/mishloach.htm].

The people at Virtual Jerusalem ask why send the same-old same-old when you can use your imagination. "One year I delivered a breakfast shalach mana: a cup of hot coffee, bagel, butter, hard boiled egg and orange juice. Another year, it was a head of lettuce, tomato, cucumber, avocado and small jar of homemade herbed salad dressing. Other memorable mishloach manot: one with an almond theme – chocolate with almonds, marzipan, roasted almonds, almond liqueur and almond brownies. Another with a fish theme – a small can of tuna, gummy fish, chocolate fish, etc." [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/purim/shalach.htm]

But if you want to give in to your sweet tooth, try your hand at something different like Purim Poppyseed Candy [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/purindex.htm], Persian Rice Cookies, Halvah with Walnuts, [http://www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=PURIM] or a couple dozen variations of hamantaschen [http://www.jewishfood.org/recipes/hamindex.htm].

Many people go way beyond the minimum when sending out mishloach manot. I like the Beit HaChatulim site, which not only has suggestions for what to put in your basket, but also gives tips about deciding who gets what: "A" list plates for special families, "B" list plates for others [http://www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/purim.htm]. You can find more tips and treats at JewishFamily [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/843.html].

Or you can read how some small communities (including Israeli kibbutzim or local synagogues) are trying to cut down the excess and waste. They "host a lottery the week before Purim in which each family randomly selects another family to which they deliver their package on Purim. This not only saves money, but also avoids potentially (inadvertently) insulting someone." [http://info.jpost.com/2000/Supplements/Purim/howtopurim.html]

Although it's not uncommon for some families to send 30, 40 or 50 packages, Barbara Silverman has them all beat. Last year, the Jerusalem woman sent over 3,000 mishloach manot boxes to soldiers for Purim. Her efforts started in October 2000 after the start of the current intifadah. When she realized just how big her task really was, she solicited help from synagogues, schools and individuals in the United States and Canada. Barbara has tried to give a boost to Israeli soldiers before. She used to send packages with high protein foods such as peanut butter, hummus and sardines [http://info.jpost.com/C001/Supplements/Purim/].

But army commanders told her that what the soldiers really wanted were chocolate and snacks. So now, soldiers opening Barbara's unique boxes discover the desired goodies – plus something not mentioned in the Gemarah – a small tube of toothpaste.

Have a very Happy Purim!

Esther, our Jewish Queen

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

There is a beautiful midrash connected to a verse in the book of Psalms. Psalm 22 begins with the phrase: "For the leader, upon the doe of the dawn..." Interestingly enough, the rabbis understand this phrase as referring to Queen Esther.

"For the leader...," for our queen. I find it unusual that we refer to Esther as Queen Esther. Although Jewish history has provided us with a handful of Jewish kings, we seem somewhat short of Jewish queens. Technically, one can say that the kings' wives were in fact the queens of Israel. King Saul had at least one wife that we know of since he blames her for what he perceives as his son's betrayal. Yet we do not know her name and she is certainly not titled "queen." Likewise, David has several wives, and Solomon has far too many wives – but still no one bears the title queen.

Our tradition gives us one queen and that is Esther. Ironically, she gains her title through being the queen of a foreign empire. She is not married to a Jewish king but has married Achashverosh and reigns over exile. So why do we still call her "Queen Esther?"

Perhaps Esther embodies attributes that make her worthy of being our leader, our queen. These are not the same virtues that lead her to foreign rule, since those are simply physical virtues. Achashverosh marries Esther because she has won a "beauty contest," the term for selection of a queen in that foreign place. But we learned from the selection of David as king that "people look to the eyes but I (God) look to the heart" (I Sam. 16:7). Something lies deeply hidden within Esther's heart.

"For the leader, upon the doe of the dawn..." The rabbis compare the events of Purim to the dawn, for they believe the hours just before dawn are the darkest hours of the night. The moon is declining and the stars are fading, but the light of the sun has not yet begun to appear. And yet, even in those darkest hours, we know instinctively that the dawn will come again. It is our trust in what we hold to be an unquestioned truth that sees us through those hours. So is the Jewish belief in God.

Esther does not appeal to God for salvation in any overt fashion. In fact, God is not mentioned in the Megillah at all. But one does not pray for the dawn to come and one does not pray for the sun to rise: these are unquestioned truths in our reality. Likewise, Esther comes to believe in her deepest heart that she and her people will be saved. This is not the truth she has hidden, it is the truth she discovers.

So why is she our Jewish queen? According to the rabbis, she is like the doe. The midrash states that when the doe is thirsty, she does not stand with her head held high and scream out for water. On the contrary, the rabbis state: she digs a hole and fixes her horns within the hole. In her distress, the doe cries softly to God and God answers by sending waters from deep within the earth. It is a private moment between the created and the Creator.

Our relationships with God are unique to each of us and lie in the most private corners of our hearts. The doe engages in the dilemma and tries to solve it and only then does she whisper her yearnings to God. Those yearnings are not for anyone to hear but One Listener.

"For the leader, upon the doe of the dawn..." – for Queen Esther.

Author Gilbert finds history in the details

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Even in history's darkest hours, Martin Gilbert manages to see the finer side of human nature.

Gilbert, a noted Oxford University professor, has over 60 published works, a dozen historical atlases and a knighthood to his credit. He is the official biographer of Winston Churchill – with six volumes to date – and co-wrote the 1981 Academy Award-winning documentary, Genocide.

His most recent book, The Jews in the Twentieth Century: An Illustrated History, combines photos with a narrative of ordinary and famous Jews from around the world.

In Toronto to promote the book, Gilbert said in an interview that the job of a true historian is to establish the bedrock of unchallenged fact.

"I'm a great believer that there is such a thing as true history. I don't think there are two versions of the same event – something happened or it didn't and it happened in a certain way or it didn't," he said.

For example, Gilbert said, when Benny Morris wrote his book about Palestinian refugees, The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947-1949, he went from village to valley to town and described the whole range of how Israelis treated Arabs in the early stages of the War of Independence.

Morris reported on those places where Arabs were expelled from their homes, as well as about those towns where they were welcomed to stay.

"Morris was a first-class researcher," Gilbert said. "However, he was followed by people who focused only on the bad side of his records. They produced one-sided books which are not history."

For historians, Gilbert said, what really happened can only be determined through details – even when the truth is sometimes difficult to come to terms with.

"Stereotypes are very convenient," Gilbert noted, adding that he plans to look at the history of Jewish councils in the Holocaust.

"Jewish councils are generally portrayed as the bad side of Jewish behaviour," Gilbert said. Yet, "there were hundreds of Jewish councils playing major parts trying to preserve the ghetto, who behaved decently and were murdered themselves."

In 1986, when Gilbert first began writing about the Holocaust, he was the only historian who used survivors' testimonies as part of his research.

"My book, The Holocaust: A Jewish Tragedy, was heavily criticized at that time by distinguished historians who hadn't yet understood that survivors' testimonies were an integral part of the story."

In addition to German documents and archival records, Gilbert added the recollections and stories of those who had witnessed and survived the incidents about which he was writing.

It didn't make sense, he said, that the Nuremberg trials relied on eyewitnesses to determine whether those charged with genocide would hang and that historians couldn't trust the evidence of similar survivors.

"There were so few survivors that every fragment of memory was precious," Gilbert said.

Born to British parents, Gilbert was evacuated to Toronto in 1940. He was three years old and spent three years on Palmerston Avenue with a foster family.

"I was part of a British scheme to evacuate a million children to Canada and the United States," Gilbert said. The plan was abandoned when the Germans started sinking the ships with the children aboard.

"I was lucky," Gilbert said, noting that he returned to England just before D-Day.

When he arrived in London, he accepted that his father was his father. "However, I had no memory of my mother" and questioned her identity. "She had a child while I was away," he added.

Over the years, things straightened out and "the family was reconstituted," he said.

Knowing how close Britain came to being invaded, Gilbert said he gets shivers when he studies war records and finds people who shared his own birth date among the lists of those deported by the Germans.

Martin Gilbert

His upcoming book, The Righteous Gentiles, will focus on more positive Holocaust stories. The book will include stories about a Chinese man who saved Jewish families in the Soviet city of Harkov, as well as those of Muslims in Bosnia who not only saved Jews, but also insisted that they be recognized as Righteous Among the Nations at Yad Vashem in Israel.

When discussing his memories of great leaders, Gilbert recalled that both Churchill and the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin taught him to look at current events with optimism.

"When things were looking really bad during the war," Gilbert said, "Churchill found the way to look beyond a possible invasion and imminent defeat to convey that there was hope and light at the end of the tunnel. Even when he himself couldn't see what the way forward was."

Similarly, in 1975, Gilbert recalls showing Rabin a map he had drawn of all the countries that had voted that Zionism equals racism at the United Nations. Rabin told him to redraw the map highlighting all the countries that did not vote in favour of that resolution.

"I did it and it turned out to be a map of all the democratic countries – Canada, the United States, Britain, France, Sweden, Belgium, Holland…

"It taught me that you have to cry out when things are wrong, but you must never forget how right and positive things can be."

Family Torah donated to congregation

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Steven Goldreich, a graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools and a Grade 9 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Richmond Hill, says reading from any Torah is an honour.

But, he said in a recent interview, reading from the Torah that once belonged to his great-grandfather, as he did this past Chanukah, is in a different category.

It was Steven's June 2000 bar mitzvah that inspired his father Alan, a 43-year-old accountant, to locate the Torah, which his maternal grandfather, Rabbi Simcha Bunem Bronstein, had purchased in New York. When he died, it was loaned to Ner Israel Yeshiva, in accordance with his wishes.

Originally Alan had hoped that Steven – his grandfather's namesake – could read from the Torah for his bar mitzvah, but he discovered on visiting Ner Israel that the Torah was not in use because it was pasul (not kosher) and there was not enough time to repair it before the bar mitzvah.

After consulting with family members and Ner Israel representatives, Alan took it on himself to have the Torah repaired, and he arranged to donate it on behalf of his family to Zichron Yisroel, the congregation at Associated's Kamin branch, where he now serves as gabbai.

"I wanted it to be used," said Alan. As of this month, the Torah, which is believed to be about 75 to 100 years old, is in regular use, he reports. A Torah generally has a lifetime of 150 to 200 years, before it becomes too brittle to repair, he said.

The Torah was donated in a festive Hachnasat Torah procession on Oct. 21, just days before Rabbi Bronstein's 25th yahrzeit. Steven and his brother Mark, 11, were among the pole-bearers for the chupah under which the Torah was carried.

In his address at the dedication ceremony, Alan remembered his Polish-born grandfather – who emigrated to Argentina as a teenager before coming to Canada in the late 1930s – as an accomplished and learned man. In addition to having smichah, he was a sofer, a shochet and a mohel.

When Alan had difficulty with some of his homework at Associated, he recalled, his mother would phone his grandfather, who would explain the relevant verse of Torah in Yiddish, and she would in turn explain it to Alan in English.

He also noted that his grandfather used to daven in small shuls, whose "haymishe" atmosphere can be found at Zichron Yisroel under the spiritual leadership of Rabbi Charles Grysman.

The Torah restoration process, which was carried out by Rabbi Asher Abitbol, a local sofer, involved many hours of painstaking work such as repair of individual letters using a quill and special inks, said Alan.

Alan also had the Torah mantle embroidered with the names of both his maternal grandparents, and his late mother, Esther, in whose memory the Torah was also donated.

"This is a legacy," he said.

Friedland writes history of University of Toronto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

As retirement projects go, this one was quite unusual.

In 1997, when University of Toronto law professor Martin Friedland was on the verge of retiring, he received a phone call from Ron Schoeffel, editor-in-chief at the University of Toronto Press.

He asked Friedland, a published writer, to submit a proposal for a history about the university, known originally as King's College.

Academia

The book would be published in 2002, the 175th anniversary of the University of Toronto.

A 1955 graduate of U of T, Friedland was initially uncertain whether he should commit to such an immense undertaking.

"In the 1970s, material had been collected for a history, but the project was abandoned."

In fact, he said in an interview, the book turned out to be the ideal retirement project. "It was fabulous. I loved doing it. The history of the University of Toronto is the history of Toronto, of Ontario and of Canada. It is also an exploration of ideas."

Looking back, Friedland believes he was chosen to write The University of Toronto: A History, due to be released on March 15, for several reasons.

"I know the university well, and like it," said Friedland, who joined the teaching staff in 1965, who was the first Jewish dean of the faculty of law (1972-79), and who served on a plethora of committees.

In addition, the selection committee knew he could meet deadlines. As he put it: "I tend to get things done on time."

Committee members were also familiar with at least some of the 16 books he had written since 1965, from Detention Before Law, an analysis of Canada's bail system, to his "true crimes" stories. (They run the gamut from The Trials of Israel Lipski, which won the 1984 Crime Writers of Canada Award for Non-fiction, to The Death of Old Man Rice.)

In researching The University of Toronto, Friedland, 69, drew on archival records, private diaries, oral interviews, secondary literature and, of course, his own experiences.

"I enjoyed every aspect of it," he said. "I was never bored. It's such a rich subject area, encompassing the entire field of human knowledge."

The book traces the development of the university into a first-rate institution, the changing religious and ethnic composition of its student body, the university's treatment of Jewish students and scholars, the physical growth of the campus, the era of student activism and the changes in Canada's intellectual and cultural climate.

Having finished the monumental task of writing The University of Toronto, Friedland – a professor emeritus and a former University Professor, a title conferred on few – will probably immerse himself in two separate projects.

He is contemplating a sequel to Access to Law, published in 1975, and is thinking of finishing a true crimes story about the first terrorist act in India perpetrated in the name of politics.

An Officer of the Order of Canada, an honour bestowed on him 12 years ago, Friedland chose a career in law because he thought it would further his ambition of becoming a Canadian diplomat.

He articled for Charles Dubin, a future chief justice of the Ontario Supreme Court, and was called to the bar in 1960, two years after graduating as top student in his class. He completed a PhD at Cambridge in 1967.

Friedland never did reach the department of foreign affairs. "I had decided to teach, and one year led to another year," he said.

He took great pleasure from teaching, and his courses ranged from criminal law and criminal procedure to crime and literature and securities regulations.

Friedland was a member of the Law Reform Commission of Canada and chaired the Ontario Task Force on Inflation Protection for Employment Pension Plans.

And he was closely involved with the Solicitor-General's Task Force on Gun Control (for which he learned how to shoot), the Joint Committee on Legal Aid, the Ouimet Committee on Corrections and the Royal Commission on the RCMP.

Although U of T did not welcome religious minorities throughout much of its early history, Friedland never experienced anti-Semitism on campus.

"Maybe my experience wasn't typical," he said. "Certainly, there was no discrimination at the law school."

Friedland, however, acknowledged that some Toronto law firms did not hire Jewish lawyers, even as late as the 1950s.

Asked to comment on a 1999 Canadian Bar Association report that the law profession is rife with racism, he said that law schools in particular, and the legal profession in general, are trying to overcome the vestiges of discrimination.

But to this day, he conceded, the poor and the uneducated, as well as various minority groups, have difficulties coping with the criminal justice system.

As for women, they have made huge strides, Friedland said.

Martin Friedland

"When I was in law school, there was only one woman in our class. Today, over 50 percent of the students are women. They're making their way up the ladder."

Friedland – a graduate of Forest Hill Collegiate – and his older brother, Sheldon, a chartered accountant, grew up in what was then north Toronto.

Friedland's father, whose family came from Minsk, was in the needle trade and then in real estate. His mother Mina's family hails from Odessa.

Judy, his wife, was chair of U of T's occupational therapy department.

The Friedlands have three children: Tom, a lawyer, and co-chair of Holy Blossom Temple's Out of the Cold program; Jenny, a teacher-turned-lawyer, and Nancy, an artist married to a lawyer. It's clear that law runs in the Friedland clan.

Holocaust seen as part of German history

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The majority of Germans believe the Holocaust is an integral part of German history and should be taught in all schools, says a German specialist in Holocaust education.

Thanks to this consensus, the teaching of the Holocaust is mandatory in Grades 9 and 10, for 20 periods a year, throughout Germany, Heike Deckert-Peaceman said in an interview last week.

Deckert-Peaceman, here to attend a York University conference on The Future of Memory, is on the staff of the Fritz Bauer Institut in Frankfurt am Main.

Its role is to sharpen awareness of the Nazi period, which lasted from 1933 to 1945.

There are few countries in the world today where Holocaust education is as important as in Germany, she said.

In addition to learning about the Holocaust in classrooms, students visit Holocaust memorials and former concentration camps and meet with Holocaust survivors to further their understanding.

"And the Holocaust is a centre point of democracy education in Germany today," she added.

But Deckert-Peaceman added this caveat: "Just because you have Holocaust education doesn't mean you'll be more tolerant. It's not like a vaccination against racism and anti-Semitism."

In German schools, courses on the Holocaust are mandatory from only the ninth grade onward because students are not exposed to formal history lessons until Grade 7.

By the time they reach the ninth grade, they are ready to begin studying the Holocaust.

Deckert-Peaceman, whose PhD thesis was on Holocaust education in German elementary schools, thinks that students should begin studying history before Grade 7, though not on a mandatory basis.

Pre-Grade 7 teachers, she noted, do not necessarily possess a knowledge of the Holocaust, nor are they emotionally prepared to teach it.

Although the Holocaust is not on the curriculum prior to Grade 7, students can acquaint themselves with it through courses in religion and ethics and through the medium of children's literature, said Deckert-Peaceman, a 38-year-old former elementary school teacher.

Some elderly teachers in eastern Germany, she said, still teach the Holocaust in the context of Communist resistance to Nazism. They are products of the former Communist regime in East Germany, which disappeared after Germany's reunification in the early 1990s.

These teachers, she pointed out, tend not to mention the Holocaust's Jewish victims, and continue to use old, out-of-date texts.

"This won't be a problem in eastern Germany in five or 10 years, after newly-trained teachers reach the classroom," Deckert-Peaceman said.

At the Fritz Bauer Institut, she develops curriculum and concepts for exhibitions and trains teachers as well.

The institute is named in honour of a German Jew who fled Germany in 1936 and returned in 1949. Bauer, who died in 1968, was the chief prosecutor in the state of Hesse and was a leader in the reform of Germany's criminal law and penal systems.

Deckert-Peaceman, born in Mainz, was raised in a politically liberal home where right-wing national ideas were scorned.

"I grew up in an open, tolerant atmosphere."

Her father's parents, however, were supporters of the Nazi regime. His grandparents were anti-Nazis.

Her mother's side of the family was also staunchly anti-Nazi.

Deckert-Peaceman's introduction to the Holocaust was The Diary of Anne Frank, which she read in Grade 6.

She said she was fortunate enough to have had teachers who shared her parents' outlook.

"They were part of the generation that broke the silence in Germany about the Holocaust."

When she was in Grade 10, she saw the U.S. television series, Holocaust, which had a tremendous impact on her.

Deckert-Peaceman's husband, Matthew, is a Jewish classical musician from New York City who has lived in Germany for more than two decades.

They have two children and they are being brought up as Jews. She converted to Judaism about three years ago.

Last year, her husband organized a Jewish music week in Mainz, a city near Frankfurt with a rich Jewish past.

She estimates that some 500 Jews, more than 90 percent of whom are immigrants from theformer Soviet Union, live in Mainz today.

Israel's 'human seal'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Soccer players the world over have developed a not-so-unique ability to control and redirect a ball using only their heads. "The header" is part of the kit of most good players, something many of them developed when they were still kids.

Israeli phenom Eyal Horn was once one of those kids, working on soccer drills like most of his buddies. But Horn has taken headers to a level they could barely imagine.

Dubbed the human seal by some and Eyal the Magnificent by his promoter, Horn is an entertainer par excellence whose shtick is to balance and bounce almost any kind of ball on his head while performing otherwise mundane tasks, like removing his shirt, sitting down, climbing a ladder or even drinking a glass of water.

Soccer balls have given way to basketballs, and Horn has gone beyond merely bouncing the balls to shooting hoops with them, including three-pointers. He is equally adept at bouncing tennis balls, ping pong balls, kids' rubber balls, plastic peas from whistles and, if you can you believe it, marbles, on his head.

He's incorporated an American football into his act and he can even get a couple of bounces out of a pharmacist's pill – a "kadoor," or ball, in Hebrew.

Horn's unique skills have been recognized by Guinness officials, who have twice included his exploits in their record book under "unusual skills" – once for the longest basket ever sunk by a head bounce and the second time for the largest number of baskets sunk by a headshot, while not allowing any rebounds to touch the court (15 in 1 minute, 26 seconds).

Incredibly, they do have records for that.

Not in the record book – What? Can somebody beat it? – is Horn's ability to bounce a tennis ball on his head 2,500 times in about 25 minutes. That's 100 times a minute, or 1.7 times a second.

Perhaps more important to Horn than the records are is the fact that his act has been catching on in NBA circles in North America. During a recent family visit to Toronto, Horn, 35, met with Raptors officials to discuss a possible engagement at the Air Canada Centre at upcoming games. Following his five-day visit to Toronto, he flew to Philadelphia, where he was to perform during NBA All-Star Game festivities. Two years ago, he performed at his first all-star game, in San Francisco, at quarter time and during time-outs. His act so mesmerized the audience that coach Phil Jackson let his players use their timeout to watch his act instead of discussing strategy, Horn said in an interview.

Afterwards, one of the players, Tim Duncan of San Antonio, came over to meet him.

"I can't forget that one of the NBA stars came to me after the game and said, 'Hey you from Israel, can I take a picture with you?'" Horn said.

Horn proudly displays a series of photos taken with Kobe Bryant and Shaquille O'Neal of the Lakers, Alonzo Mourning of the Heat and Magic Johnson, formerly with the Lakers. Knicks fans Michael Douglas and Woody Allen have also come over to congratulate him after a performance.

Clearly Horn revels in the attention.

"If an NBA player asks you to take a picture, it says a lot," he said.

Eyal Horn

The fans on both sides of the ocean clearly love his shtick (he's performed many times in Europe) and Horn believes he has the opportunity to turn this sideshow skill into a lucrative career.

His stint as a sports entertainer began more than a decade ago, though the skills that would lead him into the international spotlight were developed long before that. As a teenager, he and his buddies would compete with each other to see who could bounce a soccer ball on their head the longest. A seemingly pointless exercise, it was, soccer fans might recall, a skill that Diego Maradona demonstrated as a youngster at a World Cup game in Argentina many years ago.

Following his military service, Horn's former high school coach suggested he try his hand at entertaining at a basketball game in his native Haifa. His first performance drew an enthusiastic response from the audience of about 3,000. It was, he said, the first time fans did not leave their seats during the halftime intermission.

His showbiz break came two and a half years ago when the Miami Heat came to play Maccabi Tel Aviv, the country's premiere club, in an exhibition game. Horn's show between quarters was a big hit. After the game, NBA commissioner David Stern called him over and invited him to perform later that week in Milan at an international tournament featuring the Spurs and teams from around the world. That's when Duncan first saw his act.

Again, he was a smash hit and the NBA signed him to perform at the 2000 All-Star Game in San Francisco.

Five NBA teams subsequently invited him to their games, including the Knicks, Nets, Pacers, Heat and 76ers. The Raptors, Horn hopes, would be the sixth.

Horn also travelled with the NBA Dream Team to Sydney for the Olympics where he performed during their pre-tournament exhibition games.

A commercial for Footlocker – they're the ones who dubbed him the human seal – got him noticed by the producers at Good Morning America and he subsequently performed during a broadcast from Times Square. Horn realizes his skills have opened doors that would otherwise be inaccessible to him. An electrical worker by trade, Horn toils long hours on power lines – a physically demanding type of work.

He believes that a good agent could line up an almost unlimited number of sporting engagements as well as advertising gigs. His boss is willing to give him a leave of absence so he can pursue his dream.

In the meantime, Horn is busy working on the next addition to his act. It'll be tough, but he believes he can pull it off: sink a basket from mid-court.

If he can, somebody better call the Guinness people…

Israel advocacy reinforced at weekend retreat

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sivan Raz spent the first seven years of her life in Israel, has served in the Israeli army for two years and is president of York University's Israeli Student Association.

But the third-year political science and women's studies student still felt she could benefit from attending a recent Israel Advocacy Retreat.

The Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) event, attended by 106 students including two from McMaster University and one from the University of Western Ontario, was co-funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Hillel and the Consulate General of Israel.

Speakers included Israel-based political scientist Neil Lazarus, of Awesome Seminars, and David Goldberg, director of research for the Canada-Israel Committee.

JCS is dedicated to providing the tools and knowledge for students to become Jewish activists, wrote Zac Kaye, the organization's executive director, in a seminar handout.

Raz said she hesitates to call herself an activist, because the word has "radical" connotations for her. But she does not hesitate to articulate an Israeli perspective in one-on-one or small-group situations on campus. "An advocate, yes," she said following the retreat. "An activist – I don't know."

Kaye told The CJN that he believes there is a role for advocates.

"An advocate expresses strong views, in this case pro-Israel views, whereas an activist moves beyond mere words into doing." We do not live in an age of activism, Kaye said, although some students are taking part in activist-type events like media monitoring and even creating their own newspapers.

"We certainly feel that we're in a critical moment for Israel," he said.

Unlike Raz, Craig Byers came to the conference with little knowledge of Israel. The third-year business management student at Sheridan College is in the process of converting to Judaism and his campus has no Jewish student organization.

The weekend gave him "a new perspective" and he said he now "definitely" sees himself as an advocate for Israel. "This has begun a whole new journey for me. It has added another dimension to Judaism for me."

Lonny Kates, a third-year radio and television arts student at Ryerson University and vice-president of internal programming at Ryerson's Jewish Students Association (JSA), sees himself as an advocate, rather than an activist, for Israel.

Although his campus is relatively non-political – in fact, he noted, the JSA and its Muslim counterpart enjoy a good relationship – there was an incident of anti-Semitic and anti-homophobic graffiti there earlier this year.

That incident sparked questions, Kates said, and made him realize the importance of taking a stand. "I learned different skills [on the retreat] that allow me to help combat anti-Israel sentiment."

For Raz, Kates and about two dozen other students in the larger group, the weekend was more than just an advocacy event: They are part of a fledgling leadership development program of present Jewish student leaders and their potential successors.

The program is expected to culminate in an 18-day trip to Israel this spring, said Ron Somogyi, president of the Jewish Students' Union at the University of Toronto and an organizer of the leadership program, which was initiated by Kaye.

One of the keys to the ultimate success of the program, said Somogyi, is the diversity of the student leaders, in terms of denominational affiliation, Jewish background and involvement.

The students at the retreat were also diverse in their political views, Somogyi noted. There were many who had "strong issues" with Israeli policies, and many who "had different opinions about how we should go about being activists and advocates," he said. Some, for example, favoured public rallies while others suggested promoting dialogue.

One of the things that came out of the weekend, particularly in Lazarus' session, was a discussion about "responding honestly" if there is discomfort about Israeli policies, for example, but at the same time keeping in mind the context and the bigger picture, Kaye said.

Somogyi's only regret about the weekend was the last-minute change of venue. Because of a snowstorm, the out-of-town retreat was moved to Toronto, juggling sessions at the Lipa Green building and other locations, including York University. Although students missed out on some of the late-night and informal dialogue that might have taken place in another location, Somogyi felt the weekend was "still very successful."

Stuart Lapowich, who was hired in November as JCS' Israel affairs co-ordinator, was disappointed that a number of out-of-town students did not attend because of the weather, but otherwise said the retreat "went great."

Preparing mishlochei manot for Purim

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

On the festive day of Purim, many Jews send gifts of food to friends and relatives, as was done on the very first Purim and reported in Megillat Esther, the Purim story. The minimum requirement is two different types of food sent to one person, but many people do more. This is a good chance to spread friendship and cement bonds.

But although mishlochei manot, as they are called, have increased in some circles, they really can be kept as simple as you wish.

Homemade efforts are always appreciated. Remember that presentation is vitally important. There are various options for gift containers: decorate gift bags with children's artwork; line and decorate food boxes; weave ribbon around the edges of a pretty basket lined with a colourful remnant of cloth, tulle, paper or a cloth napkin.

Fill with mini-loaves of Almond-Poppy Seed Bread (recipe below), hamantaschen or assorted cookies. Add a tiny jar of honey or homemade jam or a container of hot fudge sauce, along with directions for storage and heating. A tiny doily-lined cellophane box can enclose an extravagant assortment of homemade sweets, individually placed in fluted paper cups.

Try a batch of Orange Chocolate Truffles, Cinnamon Nut Mix (recipes below) peanut brittle, caramels, chocolate-dipped pretzel sticks, halvah, homemade fudge or crispy rice cereal (look in any comprehensive cookbook for recipes).

When sending a package to a large family, forget gourmet items and concentrate on providing a lot of inexpensive child-friendly items: hamantaschen, popcorn balls, frosted cupcakes, chocolate spoons, chocolate-covered dried fruits, lollipops, chocolate "gold" coins. Don't forget that most people prefer to receive sealed or wrapped items only.

In Israel, many people like to send part of the food to be served at the festive Purim meal. It is best to let the recipients know in advance what you are planning, of course. Special challot, a whole baked fish, the traditional kreplach, filled Moroccan "cigars" are often sent.

A health-conscious family would be pleased to receive your own blend of herbal tea, perhaps with a sketch of the herbs on the label, bottled juices, dried fruits and nuts, homemade nut butters, marinated salads or mustards, or herbal vinegar in attractive new or recycled glass bottles or jars.

ALMOND-POPPY SEED BREAD

Three small breads can be made at one time to speed up production.

1 cup unsalted margarine, room temperature
2 cups sugar
3 eggs
1½ tsp. vanilla extract
1½ tsp. almond extract
3 tbsp. ground poppy seed
3 cups all-purpose flour, sifted
3 tsp. baking powder
1½ cups orange or white grape juice

For optional frosting:
1 cup powdered sugar
4 tbsp. orange juice
1 tsp. almond extract

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease 3 disposable aluminum loaf pans about 5 inches by 9 inches.

Cream margarine, sugar and eggs until light. Add extracts and poppy seed and mix well. Stir together flour and baking powder in a separate bowl. Add to first mixture alternately with liquid. Mix only until thoroughly combined.

Pour evenly into prepared pans. Bake for about 30 minutes or until breads pass the toothpick test. Let cool before frosting. For optional frosting: Combine powdered sugar and orange juice in a small pan over low heat. Stir until sugar dissolves. Remove from heat. Mix in extract and pour over cakes.

ORANGE CHOCOLATE TRUFFLES

These truffles are great for any special occasion treat. If packing, be sure to wrap truffles carefully so they don't get crushed. If you would prefer these to be dairy, substitute heavy cream for pareve whip. Refrigerate if cream is used, and keep under lock and key.

⅓ cup pareve whip
¼ cup unsalted margarine
6 oz. chocolate chips
2 tbsp. grated orange peel
1 tsp.chocolate liqueur
3-4 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder
3-4 tbsp. powdered sugar
3-4 tbsp. chocolate sprinkles

Combine pareve whip, margarine and chocolate chips in a small heavy saucepan over medium heat, stirring constantly, until bubbling and chocolate is almost melted. Remove from heat.

Stir until chocolate is completely melted and mixture is uniform. Stir in grated orange peel and chocolate liqueur. Pour mixture into a shallow baking pan and refrigerate 40 minutes, until firm enough to shape.

Spread 3-4 tbsp. each of cocoa, powdered sugar and chocolate jimmies on a plate. Divide cold chocolate mixture into 21 equal portions. Roll each into a ball. Roll balls in coatings, 7 per coating. Place balls in small fluted paper or foil cups. Store in airtight container. Yield: about 21 truffles.

CINNAMON NUT MIX

2 cups whole almonds
2 cups pecan halves
1 cup white sugar
1 cup firmly packed brown sugar
¼ cup ground cinnamon
1 tbsp. ground ginger
2 tsp. ground allspice
1 tsp. ground cloves
2 egg whites

Preheat oven to 300. Cover almonds and pecans with water in a large saucepan. Bring to a boil over medium heat. Reduce heat and simmer 1 minute. Remove from heat and drain well.

Combine sugars, cinnamon, ginger, allspice and cloves in a large bowl. Whisk egg whites in a medium bowl until foamy. Add nuts and stir until nuts are well coated. Pour nuts into sugar mixture, stirring until well coated.

Spread evenly on a greased baking sheet. Bake 25 minutes, stirring occasionally. Cool on baking sheet. Store in airtight container.

Jewish women preserve tradition through food, professor says

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Next time you put challah on the table, make a pot of chicken soup or deliver hamantaschen on Purim, consider the pivotal role of food – and the women who have traditionally made and served it – in preserving Jewish identity and customs.

That's the message from Norma Baumel Joseph, associate professor of religion at Concordia University, who spoke recently at Vancouver's Jewish Community Centre on Feeding an Identity: Jews, Food & Gender.

After studying various ethnic groups, Joseph contends that food is a powerful tool that can be used to study a group's social history and provide ethnographic data for understanding community and personal identity.

Who, for example, makes and delivers the food, and where, and to whom, is it served? What is the hierarchy around the dinner table, and who sits at its head? These are some of the questions we should be answering, Joseph says.

In Judaism, women are typically the cooks and servers, yet their vast repertoire of knowledge has frequently been ignored or demeaned in studies of Jewish history, she says.

"Women are the ritual specialists, the people we rely on to make sure that we eat the right things at the right time," but the importance of that knowledge has been eclipsed over the past 50 years, as issues of women's egalitarianism rose to the forefront, Joseph says.

To ignore that wisdom is a mistake, she cautions.

"We need to look for places where women did and do have power – places that are outside of the sphere of men." As an example, she cites recent literature about the expulsion of Jews from Spain in 1492, a time when they were forbidden from praying or attending synagogue.

"Women kept the Jewish tradition alive through their cooking, for example, by cooking a challah for Friday night, or by not cooking on a Saturday. Because of their role in the kitchen, women were the preservers of tradition, – but we tend to ignore, downplay and demean it," she says.

Women continue to play a critical role in the kitchen, though Joseph concedes there has been a shift in recent times.

There are fewer Jewish women in their 30s than their used to be who know, or care deeply, how to make gefilte fish or who would consider making, rather than buying, a challah.

Yet, despite the choice to buy rather than make Jewish dishes from scratch, "those same women are still concerned that the right foods be served at the right time, because they are ethnic and religious markers," Joseph says.

She has this message for Jewish women: "Enjoy making and eating Jewish food, be proud of it and see it as part of your rich heritage."

For those looking to expand their repertoire of Jewish cooking, Joseph recommends the following cookbooks: Claudia Roden's The Book of Jewish Food, Joan Nathan's The Foods of Israel Today and The Classic Cuisine of the Italian Jews by Edda Servi Machlin.

Painter's life full of narrow escapes

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Charlotte Knapp with one of her paintings.

TORONTO — For most of her 90 years, Charlotte Knapp has loved to paint.

Throughout her life, Knapp, who survived two wars, relocated from Hungary to Romania, Israel, Montreal and finally Toronto, and who recently became visually impaired as a result of macular degeneration, has recorded on canvas much of what she has seen and imagined.

Interviewed in her Thorncliffe Park condominium where she lives alone, Knapp is surrounded by her many paintings: still-lifes, florals, Israeli scenes, portraits and abstracts. She considers the most significant paintings of her career to be the 30 impressionistic works depicting scenes from the Holocaust – the gates at Dachau, the cattle cars, the scenes of destruction.

Although Knapp was not in a concentration camp, she says she became obsessed with the Holocaust, questioning why it happened and why God didn't help the Jews.

"It was my anger that led me to create the series of Holocaust paintings... I began to think that I was a survivor," she says.

She is, in a way. Born in 1911 in Arad, Hungary, now Romania, Knapp lived through World War I, the subsequent remapping of the area, the rise of Nazism, the persecution of the Jews, deportations, confiscations, loss of family and the rise of communism.

Speaking of the dangers and escapes that she calls "miracles," Knapp says, "My life can be a novel. I lived through so many death-defying instances."

One of those experiences was her arrest while she was visiting her uncle in Hungary during World War II. Sent to a detention camp, she was told she would soon be deported.

She escaped into the forest where she tried to reach the Romanian border and return to her family. She heard rustling and came across a Romanian policeman. She begged him to help her and not to turn her in. They began talking and he confided that he wanted to get married but didn't have enough money to buy a ring. She removed her engraved ring and said, "Now you can get married." At first, he refused to take it but she insisted. He then led her to the border and to safety in Romania.

"He saved my life," she says.

As a young girl, Knapp won a scholarship and went to Budapest to study art. She won many awards and went on to paint professionally for galleries.

In 1946, she married Ernest Knapp, a chemist. In 1950, she, Ernest and three-year-old son Gabe left for Israel, where Ernest worked at the British Petroleum Company in Haifa. While in Israel, she studied and created ceramics and paintings and sold her work in gift shops.

In 1957, the family emigrated to Montreal where Knapp began creating original commissioned art works for renowned art dealers. The family made a job-related move to Toronto in 1965. Ernest died 12 years ago.

Knapp recently exhibited her paintings at the Anghel Bucur Gallery in Yorkville. She has returned to painting scenes and abstracts but says her wish is to exhibit her Holocaust collection.

Parents scout out Israel trips for kids

HaShomer Hatzair has two Israel programs coming up: Yedid Plus – a leadership program for students in Grade 10, with a three-week Israel component; and Shana Tova – a 10-month college credit program. About a dozen students have signed up for the former; seven for the latter, said Merin.

Based on Merin's experience both here and in Israel – where she managed the educational touring department of an Israeli tour company – she said generally the youngsters are excited about Israel trips and their parents are concerned.

But Lori Olyan of Calgary said that neither she nor her daughter Hila, 16, had any hesitation about her participation in the parents' delegation or about Hila's participation in an upcoming Canadian Young Judaea program this summer.

"Our Jewish friends all think it's great," she said. There was only one comment that could be construed as negative: when Lori phoned to inquire about health insurance, she was asked, "You're going where?"

Having lived in Israel in the 1980s, Lori said, "It always sounds worse here in Canada than it actually is."

Participant Fran Isaacs was excited last week at the prospect of her first trip to Israel. The co-ordinator for Temple Har Zion's confirmation class, which is eligible for one of the Reform movement's youth trips, also has a son who is the right age.

"I'm realistic enough to know there are certain dangers, but I believe the trips are well supervised and that they're not going to take us to dangerous places."

For parents who may consult her about the advisability of sending their children to Israel now, "I think they would trust me to be honest," she said. "And that's what I intend to be."

Family passes down tradition of serving on chevrah kadishah

By MOURA WOLPERT
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — For almost a century, it has been a Garshowitz family tradition to serve on the local Jewish burial society.

Since 1908, when Golda and Yisroel Garshowitz arrived here from Russia, there has always been at least one member of the Garshowitz family in the Hamilton chevrah kadishah, whose volunteer members perform the ritual preparation of the dead for interment.

It is a family tradition that was likely established generations ago.

"It's the last thing you can do for a person and it's not about what you receive back. The women who work with me feel the same way," says Golda and Yisroel's great-granddaughter, Cheryl Katz, who today is in charge of the chevrah kadishah's women's section. (Her eldest son, Jordan, is a chevrah kadishah volunteer in New York.)

In 1911, Golda and Yisroel's son, William (Zev Wolf), a widower with two young daughters, married Sarah Borovoy. They had another five sons and five daughters.

Sarah taught Jewish burial rituals to her daughters, and later her sons and sons-in-law became involved, as did other relatives.

Two of her daughters, Goldie Robbins and Esther Shecter, still volunteer when they are not in Florida for the winter.

Robbins, the second youngest of William and Sarah's children, has been a volunteer for 37 years, while her late husband, Harry, who served as a nurse with the Canadian forces medical corps during World War II, was a volunteer for 47 years, almost "from the day we were married," she says.

In 1970, when they retired from their clothing store, Shecter and her late husband, Al, also joined the chevrah kadishah.

The ritual washing of the body is performed by men for males and by women for females. (According to tradition, only older, post-menopausal women are permitted to perform this task.) When the time came, William asked Sarah, who was already a midwife, to help out.

Robbins remembers how her mother would often go out, saying simply: "I have to go out now." She never mentioned where she was going, nor would she say anything when she returned.

"It's something you don't talk about," says Robbins. "We work quietly. When we've finished, we lock the door and go home. We never talk about it."

Robbins says that one day when her mother was off work due to illness, she "took me by the hand and said: 'You've got to help.'"

Although completely blind by then, Sarah taught the rituals to her daughter. She also continued to instruct others and worked for the chevrah kadishah until the very end of her life.

When Sarah died, only her daughters attended to her, as she had wished.

As time went on and the family began to disperse, it became more and more difficult to find volunteers in Hamilton and, eventually, the rabbi who oversaw the chevrah kadishah allowed younger women to join, provided they were trained nurses or doctors.

Katz, one of Robbin's four daughters, recalls how in the past, when no one else was available, "it was always my mom and dad" who would answer the call.

Sometimes, during the summer, Katz says, her parents would arrive at their cottage only "to turn around and drive right back."

Robbins is impressed with the dedication shown by the next generation. "They take it very seriously," she says. "It is something you do from the heart."

Adds Katz: "It's the one thing you can do for a person [for which] they will not be able to thank you."

Arab journalist puts lie to Palestinian claims

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Joseph Farah has been a newspaperman for more than 25 years, but it wasn't until he took on what he calls the myths of the Middle East in a same-titled column on his WorldNetDaily.com Web site on Oct. 11, 2000, that he became an overnight sensation.

"Something magical happened," he says. "That column was read by millions of people around the world and translated into 15 languages."

In the article, the right-wing commentator charged that Palestine is a fiction, that there is no distinct Palestinian language or culture, that "Palestinians" are Arabs indistinguishable from Arabs in neighbouring countries and that there are no real Islamic holy sites in Jerusalem.

But it wasn't so much the charges that caused the sensation as much as Farah himself. Farah is an Arab-American (he is Christian, not Muslim).

"He is an inspiration to us all," said David Asper as he introduced Farah to an audience of several hundred at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in Winnipeg on Feb. 10 in what was Farah's first speaking engagement in Canada. (Farah was the latest in the Asper Foundation Performance's Lecture Series.)

"He has broken new ground in Internet news," Asper said. "And he is one of the few people in the media who speak the truth and provide the real facts despite the risks involved considering his background."

Farah, who came of age during the Watergate era, told the audience, "I tried to model myself after Woodward and Bernstein [the reporters who broke the Watergate story]. I believe in a free press that acts as a watchdog over government."

Farah, who grew up in a Lebanese community in New Jersey, said early in his career he shared his community's prejudices concerning Israel. The turning point for him came after a visit to southern Lebanon in the early 1980s, before the Israeli invasion. He saw the devastation caused by the PLO in that area. He found that when he tried to print his stories with the truth in Arab American newspapers, the stories were either rejected or heavily edited to reflect the usual Arab viewpoint.

> 'The truth is the Arabs want all of the Middle East'

"Most news sources will tell you that the problems in the Middle East revolve around the Palestinians' desire for a homeland and Muslim desire for control of their holy places," he said. "Those are phony excuses. The truth is the Arabs want all of the Middle East. No matter how many concessions Israel makes, it will never be enough."

Western politicians and the media make the mistake of taking Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat and his spokespeople at their English words. They don't pay attention to the quite different statements he makes to his own people in Arabic, Farah said.

Farah said one of the reasons why most media outlets seem more sympathetic to the Arabs is that the Arabs are much better than the Israelis at public relations. The Arabs, he said, have always been outstanding storytellers and are quite comfortable lying in fiery, threatening, bellicose language. They make up fantastic stories about Israeli atrocities, while Israeli spokespeople, on the other hand, are low-key and will admit to errors, he added.

"You have to give the Arabs credit," Farah said. "This Palestine fiction is the most effective propaganda campaign that the world has ever seen."

Farah also pointed to the moral relativism that permeates the western world which makes it difficult for westerners to deal with outright lies.

"There is clearly a right and a wrong side in the Middle Eastern conflict," Farah said. "Israel isn't perfect. Neither is the United States. There are a lot of things Israel does that I disagree with. Yet when you compare Israel with its democratic freedoms with the repressive, totalitarian regimes in the Arab world, there is no comparison."

As to who or what defines a "Palestinian," Farah said that the meaning of "Palestinian" is whatever Arafat wants it to mean.

Most Arabs living in Jerusalem have come from other countries, Farah said. Since the Oslo Accords were signed, tens of thousands of Arabs have illegally crossed into Israel, Judea and Samaria from other Arab countries drawn by the economic opportunities and freedom. Since 1967, there have been more new Arab settlements built in Judea and Samaria than Jewish settlements, he noted.

"If Israel were so intolerable for Arabs, why do they continue to come? How many years do you have to live there before you become a Palestinian? Two? Five?"

As for Arafat, Farah charged that in 1973, the PA president gave the order to kill American and Belgian diplomats that his terrorists were holding hostage in an effort to win the release of Sirhan Sirhan, Robert Kennedy's assassin. The American state department knows this, Farah said, but department officials still see Arafat as their best chance for peace and are reluctant to admit they have been wrong all along.

The bottom line, Farah said, is that the Middle East conflict is a struggle between good (the Israelis) and evil and the only way Israel is going to prevail is with "prayer and the use of force."

Community should respond to anti-Israel reporting: Asper

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish community needs to be more aggressive in responding to slanted media stories about Israel, says Gail Asper of CanWest Global Communications.

Speaking at an interfaith luncheon at Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Synagogue last month, Asper said Southam newspapers, which are owned by the Asper-family-controlled CanWest, are flooded with letters from Muslims around the world whenever a pro-Israel article runs.

"We need the same systematic and active monitoring system," she said in an interview. "We Jews have become incredibly complacent. We can't even get 200 people out to a rally in Winnipeg to show our solidarity with Israel here."

She said ordinary Jews need to take personal responsibility rather than wait for Jewish organizations to act. "It is not somebody else's job, it's our job," she said.

Asper, daughter of CanWest executive chairman Izzy Asper, said she has personally written a number of letters to the Globe and Mail about articles she feels are slanted against Israel. They haven't all been printed, she said.

"Most people I know don't send letters because they don't feel they're knowledgeable enough," she said.

Terry Moore, comment editor for the Winnipeg Free Press, recalls one story that attacked Islam that ran in his paper about 6 months ago and drew a huge Muslim response. "The e-mail traffic was enormous," he said.

"We had e-mail from all over the world. It was a stupid piece. Our publisher, Nick Hurst ran an editorial a couple of days later saying that it was a stupid piece."

A more recent opinion article by Ottawa contributor Harry Sterling on the Pakistani intelligence service's record of promoting terrorism also drew reaction from local Muslims, Moore said.

On the other hand, he said, Gwynne Dyer's columns on the Middle East elicit reaction from some Jewish readers.

"Gwynne has a blind spot where the Middle East is concerned," Moore said. "Some of our Jewish readers don't think he paints an honest picture of the situation."

Joe Wilder, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, agrees with Gail Asper that the Jewish community has been apathetic about speaking out for Israel.

"Since Oslo and the Madrid Conference before it, we have been waiting for peace to break out," Wilder said. "It has only been since the violence began in September 2000 that it has become apparent that peace is not going to happen any time soon.

"People have had to transfer to a different mode of thinking. Sept. 11 was a real wake-up call. It takes time to retool, but I believe that the organized Jewish community is doing it."

As proof, Wilder cited the Israel solidarity rallies held across Canada last fall and the CIC's new outreach committee, which has crossed the country.

CIC representatives, he said, have also met with the editorial boards of the Globe and the Toronto Star to discuss their reporting on Israel and the organization's Web site has information about how to write letters to media outlets and politicians.

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 20 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 9 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Wednesday, March 6, 2002 at Sephardic Kehila Centre (Bathurst/Steeles). It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:00 p.m. This year Windsor Bridal will be presenting their 2002 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

Misdirected, misplaced cynicism

According to Reports

With the media focusing so intensely on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, other issues in the Middle East posing serious risks to regional peace and security are often overlooked.

Lebanon is a good example.

Hezbollah, aided by Syria and controlled and funded by Iran, threatens to open a second front along the Israel-Lebanese border, beyond the glare of TV cameras and, evidently, beyond the interest of most editorial writers.

In addition to recent provocations, Hezbollah was also involved in the "Karine-A affair," the attempt to smuggle fifty tons of heavy weaponry from Iran to the Palestinian Authority (PA). The full implication of this PA-Iran-Hezbollah connection has yet to be covered properly.

The UN has certified that Israel has fully withdrawn from Lebanon in accordance with UN Security Council Resolution 425. But Hezbollah supports the extremist agenda promulgated by Iran's ayatollahs who call for Israel's destruction. It is determined to continue its armed confrontation with Israel, although in doing so, it has lost any semblance of international legitimacy.

Earlier this month, Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres charged that Iran had stationed members of its Revolutionary Guard in south Lebanon and supplied Hezbollah with 10,000 rockets, some with a 70-kilometer range capable of striking at Israel's heartland.

"Iran has transformed Lebanon into a powder keg, endangering the future of Lebanon," Peres said.

Instead of taking these threats seriously, major elements of the media have directed their cynicism at what they view as Israel's propaganda campaign against Iran – a campaign they believe is shaping U.S. policy. The very idea that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon could lead U.S. President George W. Bush by the nose is noxious, but fairly widespread. On Feb. 9, the highly influential conservative British weekly The Economist published an article entitled "Israel and America: Influence or confluence?" and subheaded "George Bush's hit list could have been written by Ariel Sharon." At the other end of the spectrum, in the leftist Guardian, David Hirst, a staunch critic of Israel, writes: "There is no issue on which the Israelis, through their extraordinary influence in Congress and elsewhere, have proved better able to shape U.S. policies than this one" (Guardian Weekly, Feb. 7-13).

Such estimates of the influences on U.S. foreign policy tread on dangerous ground, evoking unsavory connotations about Jewish power and control. They also insult the intelligence of Americans who determine policy according to their own national interests and distract attention from the real issue: Iran's nefarious activities in Lebanon and elsewhere.

PA needs to restore Israelis' belief in peace, leader says

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The head of the Palestinian Legislative Council, Abu Ala (Ahmed Qureia), says the Palestinian Authority needs to take actions to restore to the Israeli public a belief that peace is possible with the Palestinian people.

In a lengthy interview broadcast last Friday on Palestinian TV, Abu Ala said Palestinian mistakes were among the reasons Israelis no longer supported peace.

"I believe that we must also consider the rightward shift that Israeli public opinion has taken," he said.

"You know who is in the running [for the elections] in Israel," he added. "Unfortunately, even the other movement [meaning Peace Now] has begun to dwindle in Israel, apparently due to some of the methods that we use."

Abu Ala added that "some of the actions that harm us need to stop. We must know how to organize a proper resistance so that it will bring results and not disappointment."

He said most of the efforts need to focus on an attempt to renew negotiations with Israel, adding there is a worldwide consensus that the Palestinians are to blame for the current situation.

"Let's be honest. Everyone who visits us or we visit them hold the same opinion: The Palestinians are the source of the tension," he said.

When asked about his talks with Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, Abu Ala said the discussions revolved around whether joint recognition of the existence of both sides, based upon the borders of June 4, 1967, would convince both parties that the other was serious about peace.

The Palestinian legislator said he believed Peres was honest with him. "We are not talking about a man off the street here," Abu Ala said. "It is not a government ploy either. The man who spoke with me was the Israeli foreign minister."

Europe must support U.S.: Peres

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ROME — Europe must back the United States in its war against terrorism and should not take sides in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, says Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

Earlier this week, Peres told the Italian daily La Repubblica it was bad for Europe to be seen as pro-Palestinian and the United States to be seen as pro-Israel.

"I hope that Europe will continue to support the U.S. stance, especially with regard to terrorism. In general any division between the United States and the European Union is dangerous and counterproductive for peace," he said. "I ask my European friends to be neither pro-Israeli nor pro-Palestinian, but simply to be pro-peace."

Peres said granting Palestinians autonomy in areas of Gaza and the West Bank has been insufficient. "The Palestinians now seem weaker than before. Therefore, I think that there is an urgent need to recognize their state. Moreover, I don't see any reason to wait. The sooner this is done, the better," he said.

Peres was to meet Spanish Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar today to discuss the Mideast crisis. Spain currently chairs the 15-nation European Union. Europe believes there should be less stress on security and more on political aspects of the conflict, while Israel and the United States have urged a halt to violence in the region before peace talks can resume.

Peres said the IDF would respond to any new threat, even if the political goal was to avoid more violence.

Security services foil suicide bombers

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The police, Shin Bet and IDF foiled five suicide bombers last Sunday. Two were killed not far from an army camp near Hadera. Three others were captured on two separate missions inside the West Bank.

A suicide bomber, apparently on his way to Jerusalem, was arrested near Ramallah, and a senior army officer said the IDF captured another two suicide bombers between Nablus and Ramallah.

Three police officers were injured, one seriously, in an incident that began near the army base east of Hadera.

Officials with the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, affiliated with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement, claimed responsibility for the attempt and said Mohammed Hmuda, 18, planned to detonate himself in a suicide attack on the base, while 22-year-old Abdeljaber Khaled, was to spray the camp with bullets from the assault rifle he carried.

In response to the attack, Ra'anan Gissin, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's spokesperson, said Israel would not escalate the violence, but "the terrorists will find out that we have more ways to reach them than what we have done up to now."

Red Crescent workers implicated in attacks

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli security officials allege that three members of the Palestinian Red Crescent emergency medical services were involved in the Jan. 27 suicide bombing in Jerusalem that killed one elderly Israeli and injured more than 100 people.

As reported recently in Ha'aretz, Red Crescent officials have denied Israeli suspicions that the female attacker, Wafa Idris, had travelled from Ramallah to Jerusalem in a Red Crescent ambulance. Idris, who died in the explosion, apparently did not plan to commit suicide but was killed as a result of an error with the detonation of the bomb.

On the basis of their investigation into the attack, Israeli military and security officials say that Idris, who volunteered as a medical secretary and aide with the Red Crescent, was sent to carry out the attack by Mohammed Hababa, a Fatah activist from the village of Beit Ichsa near Ramallah who worked as a Red Crescent ambulance driver.

According to the Israeli sources, a second Red Crescent employee, Monsour Noor, was also involved in planning the attack. Noor, from the town of Anabta, near Tul Karm, is currently under interrogation by the Palestinian Authority security forces.

Israeli officials say they do not yet have a clear picture of how Idris got to Jerusalem and whether she made use of Red Crescent identification papers to get into the city.

The officials allege that another ambulance driver, identified as Hamas activist Nidal Nazal of Qalqilyah, also took advantage of his job with the Red Crescent and used his ambulance to provide courier services for a network of Hamas outposts in the West Bank. Nazal, who is being held by Israel, denies the charge.

Kassam-2 can't hit cities from W. Bank: Intelligence chief

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — IDF Intelligence Chief Maj.-Gen. Aharon Ze'evi says the range of the Kassam-2 rocket does not extend to populated areas inside Israel when launched from the West Bank.

"We believe that the range of the rocket is six kilometers, no more," he said in a television interview last Sunday. "We conducted tests with the Raphael Armament Development Authority and discovered that it cannot hit populated areas in Israel."

He added that the rocket was no more dangerous than a mortar, but said the Palestinians are continuously trying to improve the rocket's range.

Ze'evi also said IDF intelligence had information that Palestinian organizations were planning more suicide bomb attacks inside Israeli cities.

Regarding Iraq, Ze'evi said Israel believes "[Saddam Hussein] has chemical weapons and that he might use them should he find himself in a crisis. We believe that the air force can handle them."

He also said the IDF was prepared for an escalation of violence on the northern border, including both Hezbollah in southern Lebanon and on the Syrian front.

Ze'evi refused to reveal his position on kidnapped air force navigator Ron Arad. "That is a delicate issue which will be discussed with the family, and not in studio," he said.

Israel home to majority of Jews by 2030, study says

By JESSICA STEINBERG
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Thirty years from now, most of the world's Jews will be living in Israel, the Jewish Agency for Israel says.

The projection was released as part of a new worldwide Jewish demography research project launched last week by the Jewish Agency.

Headed by Hebrew University Professor Sergio DellaPergola, the project – known as the Jewish Demography Initiative – will gather and co-ordinate data aimed at helping Jewish and Israeli government decision-makers set policies regarding immigration, housing and related issues.

The initiative, which will have an international advisory board, will also seek to increase public awareness about the impact of demographic trends on Israeli society and world Jewry.

In 1939, there were 17 million Jews worldwide. By 1945, after the Holocaust, there were 11 million. If steps are not taken to strengthen Jewish identity, today's population will drop, said Sallai Meridor, chair of the Jewish Agency.

"The major difference is that now there is a lot we can do about it," he said.

Meridor said the committee's plan for Jewish survival will aim to strengthen the family, improve Jewish education, and increase immigration to Israel.

He said strategies are also needed to prevent intermarriage, but at the same time help the children of such marriages connect to Judaism.

DellaPergola said worldwide Jewish population growth, which has slowed down over the past 40 years, is now close to zero per cent. From 2000 to 2001, it rose 0.3 per cent, versus worldwide population growth of 1.4 per cent.

DellaPergola said in the 13 years after the Holocaust, the Jewish population grew by 1 million. It took another 38 years for it to grow another million, he said. Even an increase of 0.4 per cent in the fertility rate would add millions of Jews over the next 50 years, DellaPergola said.

Meridor said it is more likely Jews will remain Jewish if they live in Israel, home to about 37 per cent of all Jews.

Israel's Jewish population increased by 1.6 per cent last year, while the Diaspora population dropped by 0.5 per cent, DellaPergola said. In 2001, 8.3 million Jews lived in the Diaspora and 4.9 million lived in Israel.

Among the other statistics released by the agency:

• The worldwide Jewish population, currently about 13 million, is expected to reach almost 16 million in 2080.

• Some time after 2030, Israel will be home to the majority of world Jewry, due to high assimilation rates and low birthrates in the Diaspora.

• The Jewish population in the Diaspora is older than in Israel. According to a 1995 survey, 27 per cent of Israel's Jewish population is younger than 14, compared to 18 per cent in the Diaspora. Only 12 per cent of Israel's Jewish population is over 65, compared to 19 per cent in the Diaspora.

• Mixed marriages are reducing the number of Jews, because only a fraction of the children of such marriages regard themselves as Jewish.

• In 2080, 81 per cent of Jewish children under 14 will live in Israel.

"Two of the most serious problems for Jewish demography are birthrates and intermarriage. Living in Israel has a clear advantage over the Diaspora in both cases," DellaPergola said.

"When it comes to intermarriage, had the millions of immigrants who came from the former Soviet Union over the last decade stayed in their own countries, it is reasonable to assume that 90 per cent of their children would not be defined today as Jewish," he said.

Commenting on DellaPergola's findings, Housing Minister Natan Sharansky said last week that the "reality of these figures is that Israel is the safest place for the Jewish future, even in these difficult times, when Jews are killed almost every day."

Also commenting on the figures, Jewish Agency treasurer Chaim Chesler focused on non-Jews who have come to Israel along with their Jewish relatives, primarily from the former Soviet Union.

Some "275,000 new immigrants are not Jewish according to halachah [Jewish law]," Chesler said. "But they have joined their destinies with that of Israel. They serve in the army, and they have paid a heavy price in blood in the course of terrorist attacks."

Calling the issue of their non-Jewish status a "social time bomb," Chesler called on the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate to find a "lenient" solution that "will enable those who so desire to become part of the Jewish people."

DellaPergola said that North America's Jewish population of about 6 million is the largest in the world, and that most Jews in the world live in cities.

He said greater Tel Aviv, with 2.5 million Jews, is the world's largest Jewish city, followed by New York with 1.9 million, Haifa with 655,000, Los Angeles with 621,000, Jerusalem with 570,000 and southeast Florida with 514,000.

Israel's Museum Mania

Stuffy, dusty and dedicated to ancient life. That's what comes to mind when many people think of museums. But not in Israel. Here hundreds of museums reflect the country's unquenchable curiosity about literally everything – rabbis, poets and artists, trains, boats and planes, taxes, stamps and coins, history, science and technology. Here is a small sampling of what's available.

The Israel Museum in Jerusalem – It's the country's largest, with over 500,000 exhibits, including the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Billy Rose Sculpture Garden.

The Bloomfield Science Museum – Also in Jerusalem, this facility, built with the help of Montreal's Bloomfield family, is an interactive, lively look at how science accompanies daily living.

Beit Hatefuzot in Tel Aviv- Popularly known as the Diaspora Museum, it's a multi-media exploration of Jewish life around the world.

The Israel Children's Museum in Holon, south of Tel Aviv –This is where kids are actually invited to touch and feel all the exhibits.

The Clandestine Immigration and Naval Museum The boats that carried illegal Jewish immigrants to Palestine under British rule are brought to life, here on Haifa's Allenby Street.

For a complete listing of Israel's remarkable museums, visit www.ilmuseums.com.

World Court ruling dims chances of Sharon trial in Belgium

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

THE HAGUE — The legal adviser to Belgium's foreign ministry said last week a war crimes lawsuit filed in Brussels against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon would likely be dropped after the World Court ruled serving ministers should be protected from prosecution.

But despite the ruling, an Israeli group said it will continue to pursue a similar suit seeking to have Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat tried for crimes against humanity.

"The Sharon case, in my opinion, is closed," legal adviser Jan Devadder told Reuters after the ruling by the UN's highest judicial body.

The Hague-based International Court of Justice (ICJ), also known as the World Court, ruled in a case similar to the one against Sharon that Belgium had no right to issue an arrest warrant for a former Congolese minister accused of human rights abuses because he was immune from prosecution and the warrant was issued while he was in office.

"The immunities under customary international law, including those of ministers for foreign affairs, remain opposable [applicable] before the courts of a foreign state, even where those courts exercise an extended criminal jurisdiction on the basis of various international conventions on the prevention and punishment of certain serious crimes," Gilbert Guillaume, president of the ICJ, said in his ruling.

The Congo case was similar to the case against Sharon, whose trial on genocide and war crimes charges is sought by Palestinians alleging that, as Israeli defence minister, he was involved in the 1982 massacre of Palestinian refugees in Lebanon by a pro-Israel Christian militia.

Devadder said the court in the Sharon case "will have to take into account the judgment. The judgment is clear: immunity for all ministers for all crimes while they are still in office."

The day after Devadder's statements, the Terror Victims Association, representing 30 Israeli victims of Palestinian political violence, pledged to continue with their suit against Arafat.

The group petitioned a Brussels court in November to prosecute Arafat under a 1993 law giving jurisdiction over foreigners who committed human rights violations outside Belgium.

"We are continuing with our suit against Arafat," group chairman Meir Indor told Reuters. "The fact Sharon has been relieved of the legal farce fabricated for him need not prevent a true trial of he who truly committed crimes and brought about the murder and injury of thousands of victims."

The Israeli group said the ICJ ruling in the Congo case did not apply to Arafat and his Palestinian Authority.

"An autonomy is not a state, and international law does not afford protection to its senior officials," said the group's lead attorney, Yaakov Rubin.

Another 22 complainants have been added to the suit, the group said.

The Sharon case has been delayed while a Brussels appeals court decides if Belgium has the right to prosecute the prime minister.

Devadder said it was no mistake that the Brussels ruling on Sharon was not scheduled to be released until after the World Court had given its ruling in the case of the former Congolese minister.

Belgium used a controversial human rights law to issue an arrest warrant against Congo's then-foreign minister Yerodia Aboulaye Ndombasi, on charges of crimes against humanity. But the court ruled in favour of the Democratic Republic of Congo and said Belgium must cancel the arrest warrant.

The landmark ICJ decision could lead Belgium to revise its laws and possibly drop cases against not only Sharon and Arafat, but other leaders as well, including Cuban President Fidel Castro.

Arafat must rein in violence, says Britain's Foreign Secretary

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

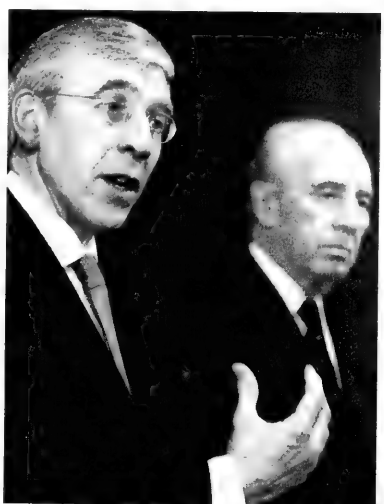
JERUSALEM — British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said last week that Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat needed to clamp down on violence against Israelis as the first step toward renewing negotiations.

Europeans should not adopt a position at odds with the United States, Straw said. "If the international community is divided... that will make the path to peace much more difficult."

Speaking following meetings with Israeli leaders in Jerusalem, Straw said the suicide attacks that Israelis had endured during more than 16 months of conflict were "almost impossible to imagine."

"The first steps that have to be taken are to make the life of the people of Israel much more secure, and that means clamping down on the terrorism which comes from the occupied territories," Straw said during a joint news conference with Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, adding that he would take that message to Arafat at the PA Chairman's headquarters in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Straw did not criticize Israeli raids in the Gaza Strip last Wednesday in which five Palestinian policemen were killed. When asked about the incursions, he said: "I regret the death of anybody in this region and elsewhere. It's possible to reel off similar lists on both sides and very long lists of people who have been killed in suicide bombings.



Jack Straw and Shimon Peres at a press conference last week.

"This is a dreadful situation for every innocent person," he said.

Israel has demanded a complete cessation of Palestinian violence for seven consecutive days before resuming negotiations, and the United States has not opposed that stance. Palestinians say that is a ploy to prevent talks from ever getting started.

European Union foreign ministers, who met recently in Spain, diverged from the U.S. approach to Middle East peacemaking and said there should be less emphasis on security and more on political aspects of the conflict.

But Straw, who said the U.S. and EU should maintain the same position on the conflict, drew a parallel between the wave of attacks that Israel has faced and the 1998 bombing carried out by a breakaway group from the Irish Republican Army that killed 29 people in the town of Omagh in Northern Ireland.

"If that had continued weekend after weekend, it would have completely changed our politics and the ability of the British government to take action as we would have wished," he said.

Threats won't sway mosque committee: Sharansky

By ORI NIR

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Housing and Construction Minister Natan Sharansky, who heads the ministerial committee reviewing the construction of a mosque near the Basilica of the Annunciation in Nazareth, has warned the quarreling sides not to threaten the panel.

Attempts to "influence the committee's work at the last minute can only hurt" those attempting to do so, Sharansky said earlier this week. "I advise everyone... not to get involved in threats, because it will not influence us."

The panel, he said, would make its decision according to "the law, the state's interests and the desire to protect the holy places and the rights of religious and national minorities."

Representatives from both sides involved in the dispute – the Catholic Church and the Waqf (Islamic religious trust) – over the building of the Shihab a-Din Mosque opposite the basilica have recently warned of the negative implications of the committee's recommendations.

Last week, the Islamic representatives said a decision to halt construction will prompt severe protests, adding that they will continue with the construction, no matter what the panel rules. Meanwhile, Vatican representatives said the mosque would not merely affect Israel's relations with the Vatican, but would also prejudice the relations of the entire Jewish people with the Christian world.

David Jaeger, the Holy See's legal adviser on Israeli affairs, defended this threat, saying it was Israel that had first defined itself as the representative of the Jewish people as a whole. When it negotiated the establishment of relations with the Vatican in 1992-93, he said, Israel had insisted that the agreement explicitly stated that it had been signed "in the context of the reconciliation between the Jewish people and the Catholic Church."

Jaeger added the agreement included a promise of mutual respect for each other's religious symbols, noting the basilica was the chief symbol of Christianity in Nazareth. Construction of a mosque at this site, therefore, "is like a fist in the face," he said. "It is a wound that can never be healed... It will be a cancer in the body of relations between the Vatican and the Jewish people."

Construction of the mosque was approved by both the Netanyahu and Barak governments, but the current government agreed to reconsider the issue in response to pressure from the Christian world.

Sources say the committee is weighing two options. One is to forbid construction at the current site, but give the Muslims an alternative plot of land in downtown Nazareth, plus generous compensation. The second is to permit the building of a smaller mosque than originally planned.

Scientists to establish cancer, cardiac research centres

TORONTO — Two senior scientists at Sunnybrook & Women's College Health Sciences Centre recently received about $20 million to continue research in their respective fields of cancer biology and cardiac imaging.

With money from the federally funded Canadian Foundation for Innovation, the province's Ontario Innovation Trust and Sunnybrook & Women's, Dr. Robert Kerbel will establish the Toronto Angiogenesis Research Centre and Dr. John Rowlands will found the Imaging Research Centre for Cardiac Intervention.

"Cancer and heart disease are two of Canada's most deadly diseases," said Dr. Michael Julius, vice-president of research at Sunnybrook & Women's. "These centres are the departments of 'future medicine' that will develop novel approaches to treating and detecting these diseases and ultimately work to save lives."

Angiogenesis – the growth of new blood vessels – occurs naturally in a healthy body to heal wounds and and to restore blood flow to tissues after an injury.

In diseases such as cancer, new blood vessels grow to feed diseased tissues. In the process, they destroy normal tissues and allow tumour cells to escape into the circulatory system and lodge in other organs.

Antiangiogenic therapies to halt the growth of new blood vessels are being developed to treat cancer and other conditions.

"One of the most significant recent developments in the treatment of cancer is the use of drugs as angiogenesis inhibitors," says Kerbel.

"The drugs currently being used in this application do not cause tumour shrinkage, but instead they induce dormant, stable disease. We're looking at how to starve tumours and control their growth over a long period of time and treat cancer as a chronic illness such as diabetes."

A team of researchers and clinicians from Sunnybrook & Women's and the Hospital for Sick Children will staff the Toronto Angiogenesis Research Centre, which will work to translate animal anti-angiogenic research into human trials.

It will also be a hub for testing new drugs and therapies and a resource for designing and implementing anti-angiogenesis-based trials.

A multidisciplinary team will also come together to form the Imaging Research Centre for Cardiac Intervention, a laboratory where clinical teams and researchers can work together to develop and evaluate the latest equipment and methods in cardiac imaging.

"It's our intention to build the blueprint for what cardiac intervention suites will look like in the future," says Rowlands. "Our lab will use several imaging modalities such as MRI, ultrasound and X-ray to provide more revealing pictures of blockages in the arteries, which will improve treatment and have an impact on our population's cardiac health."

The Canadian Foundation for Innovation contributed 40 per cent of the total funding for the two centres and the Ontario Innovation Trust is expected to match this amount. Sunnybrook & Women's, which is affiliated with University of Toronto, will cover the remaining 20 per cent.

North York General opens new neonatal unit

TORONTO — Tony Clement, Ontario minister of health and long-term care, recently opened the new Tippet Foundation Neonatal Intensive Care Unit (NICU) at North York General Hospital.

The $4.5-million unit features care-by-parent rooms, equipped with a bed, bassinet, bathroom and kitchenette. Parents of babies who have been unable to care for their child while he or she was in the NICU can use the rooms before going home to learn, under a nurse's supervision, how to care for their baby.

There is also a courtesy room with a shower, so parents of a critically ill newborn can stay overnight.

The new unit contains state-of-the-art equipment and has a low-stimulus environment, including lighting that can be dimmed over each bassinet, carpets that minimize noise levels, and controlled air temperature and quality. Each baby can have his or her own space, with curtains for privacy.

"The completion of the new NICU is an important step in cementing our role as a designated Regional Children's Health Centre and a founding member of the Child Health Network," said Susan Kwolek, director of the hospital's Pediatric and Maternal Newborn Programs.

With an expected 40 per cent increase in patients by the year 2003, North York General Hospital will become one of Ontario's busiest maternity centres, with more than 5,500 babies born annually.

About one in 10 of those babies will be born prematurely or critically ill and will require special intensive care in the hospital's new NICU. This advanced level 2 centre can handle infants that require short-term assisted ventilation and intravenous nutrition.

The hospital's original NICU opened in 1977. It was designed to handle nine babies, but could accommodate up to 16 babies when demand was especially high. The new unit includes 12 bassinets and four care-by-parent rooms. It can accommodate future expansion to 25 bassinets.

The Tippet Foundation, which supports youth, health, education and social services in the province, donated $500,000 to build the NICU, while the Ontario government contributed $3 million. The remainder of the cost came from other donations to the hospital's $35-million fundraising campaign, which has raised $28 million since 1999.

Youth groups build menschen: Mock

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Youth groups such as BBYO play a key role in helping parents raise their children to become menschen, says Karen Mock, newly named executive director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

Mock, former national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada and an alumnus of BBYO, told a recent gathering of BBYO's alumni association that BBYO has had a lifelong influence on her. Youth who participate in these groups, said Mock, develop a positive self-esteem and meet role models who teach them the difference between right and wrong.

Extensive psychological research has been done on people who risked their lives to save Jews during the Holocaust, she said, and although many of these people had very little in common, they did share four characteristics that distinguished them from others.

The rescuers all had positive self-esteem, were critical thinkers who did not necessarily follow the crowd, had positive role models, and felt a sense of belonging to their own family, community or group.

Cults and white supremacist groups know that young people are drawn in because the youth do not feel a sense of belonging to their own group, Mock said.

"Without that sense of grounding, youth seek out groups who can offer them a pseudo-religion. They are drawn in because they have not felt part of a family or youth group."

Teens who belong to Jewish youth groups develop a world view, "understand that there are people beyond their own backyard, and are introduced to Israel," said Mock, who travelled there for the first time in 1961 with BBYO.

Parents and other adult role models help youth understand about stereotypes and prejudice and teach them the difference between individual perpetrators of crime and a whole group, she said.

What we are looking for, she said, is "integration, not assimilation. A menschsh is not a wish-washy person. We are looking for acceptance, not tolerance. Tolerance suggests putting up with [someone]."

Battle royale over plundered art

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

While surfing the Internet a couple of years ago, by sheer chance Vera Gara stumbled upon a startling document.

She discovered a list of possessions – paintings, carpets, antique furniture and so on – that the Nazis had stolen from her family in German-occupied Austria after 1938.

In the plunder was a valuable painting by Albin Egger-Lienz entitled The Scythe Sharpener. It was one of many works of art pillaged by the Nazis before and during World War II.

After tracing it to its current owner, a wealthy Austrian physician and art collector named Rudolph Leopold, Gara and her husband, George, tried to reclaim it.

When Leopold laughed off their challenge, the Garas instituted legal proceedings against him in a bid to recover the priceless painting.

The battle royale pitting the Garas against Leopold is documented by CBC television on Wednesday, Feb. 27 at 8 p.m. in the film Restitution. Part of CBC's Witness series, Restitution was written by Robert Lower and directed by Elise Swerhone.

The story is a microcosm of a much larger issue. Spurred on by the publication of Hector Feliciano's The Lost Museum, a groundbreaking book which thoroughly exposed a brewing scandal, Jews have come forward to reclaim artworks that are rightfully theirs.

At stake are thousands of artworks, worth hundreds of millions of dollars, in public and private collections around the world, including Canada.

These treasures were wrested by Germany from Jewish families throughout Europe. Members of the Nazi hierarchy, from Adolf Hitler on down, fancied themselves sophisticated collectors.

Vera Gara's father, Moritz, a well-to-do businessman, was one of their victims.

After the Nazis robbed him, he and his family fled to Hungary. There they lived until they were rounded up.

Vera and Moritz were dispatched to Bergen-Belsen in 1944. Moritz perished there at the age of 61.

Vera and her husband immigrated to Canada in 1970, and now live in Ottawa.

After the war, Hitler's looted collection was found in an Austrian salt mine. Since the owners could not be traced, the works of art were returned to their respective countries of origin. No genuine effort was made to find their true proprietors.

About 40 years ago, Leopold purchased The Scythe Sharpener. During the 1950s and 1960s, he bought many paintings, never bothering to examine their provenance. Today his impressive collection is housed in a gallery bearing his name.

The Garas realize that litigation may well drag on for years. They also know that Leopold has been exempted from a special law passed by Austria for the recovery of stolen art.

But they are determined people, and will press on with their case.

Exploring The Outer Banks – the home of the lost colonists

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

OUTER BANKS, N.C. — Over the last 15 years, the 193-km picturesque islands known as The Outer Banks in N.C. situated midway on the Atlantic Seaboard, has developed into a popular getaway, attracting a number of Canadian tourists especially during its peak summer months.

In fact, so many windsurfers are attracted to the area, that one of America's hottest windsurfing spots located on Hatteras Island, is known as Canadian Hole.

Until the 1930s, The Outer Banks was accessible only by boat but now there are bridges connecting the islands and a ferry service carrying visitors from Hatteras Island to Ocracoke Island.

In 1587, Sir Walter Raleigh sent the first English settlers to this land to begin a new life on Roanoke Island. In 1937, Paul Green, the "father of outdoor symphonic drama", was commissioned to write The Lost Colony.

It is the longest running outdoor musical spectacular – running from mid-June to August each year – telling the compelling story of the first English settlers in the New World. Mysteriously, the entire colony disappeared off the face of the earth without a trace.

The Waterside Theatre, constructed especially for the performance, sits on the land were the actual event happened. A number of actors including Andy Griffith, who now makes his home nearby, made their professional debut in this production.

Also on Roanoke Island, next to the theatre, are Fort Raleigh National Historic Site and The Elizabethan Gardens, an impressive American garden, where it is promised that something is always in bloom. The Roanoke Island Festival Park captures 400 years of history at Roanoke Adventure Museum - with interactive exhibits and period costumes that all are welcome to try on.

The Legend of Two Path, a 45 minute film that depicts the Native American reaction to the arrival of the English colonists, plays in the park's movie theatre. Strolling through the Settlement Site, you can learn how the settlers braved the trials and tribulations of living on the rustic land.

Also at the park is a sailing ship, called Elizabeth II, built to resemble the sailing ships of the 16th century.

Roanoke Island is also home to The New North Carolina Aquariums. There are snapping and sea turtles, exotic fish, river otters, alligators, stingrays that are touchable and sharks guarding a replica of the sunken civil war shipwreck, the U.S.S. Monitor.

Once you've arrived at the Outer Banks, you might want to first visit the Aycock Brown Welcome Centre in Kitty Hawk, where you can see a video about the area, pick up literature, brochures and maps. Places of interest include the villages of Duck and Sanderling, chockfull of art galleries. Jockey's Ridge State Park located in Nag's Head is the largest living sand dune on America's East Coast.

If you are up for the challenge Kitty Hawk Sports will teach you to hand glide off the top of the dune, or you can opt to just fly a kite. Kitty Hawk Sports caters to water lovers too, with guided 2-hour Kayak Tours. Other activities available in the Outer Banks include offshore fishing and golf.

Aviation buffs will want to see where Ohio bike mechanics, brothers Wilbur and Orville Wright, flew the first successful powered flight on Dec.17, 1903. Their accomplishments are recognised today with a hilltop granite monument and a museum, home to a replica of the their biplane the Wright Flyer. Big plans are already underway to mark the 100th Anniversary in 2003.

The Cape Hatteras Lighthouse – America's tallest brick lighthouse – was recently moved from its original location. [Kathryn Kates photo]

A drive along United States' first national seashore, from Bodie Island through to Cape Hatteras National Seashore, will bring you to Cape Hatteras and the Cape Hatteras Lighthouse - America's tallest brick lighthouse.

In 1999, the 4,400-ton lighthouse was moved 16,000 ft. from its original location, which at one time was also 16,000 ft. from the now eroded shore.

The Outer Banks has a number of campgrounds, 50 B & B's and 90 hotel/motels including the premiere property: The Sanderling Inn Resort located between the Atlantic Ocean and Currituck Sound. Rooms are equipped with microwaves and a small fridge. The Spa at The Sanderling is impressive, offering a wide variety of face and body services in a serene and nurturing environment rivalling many big city spas.

Luxury cottages are available for both short and long term rentals. A 5-bedroom oceanfront cottage rented during the summer months costs approximately $2,000 US, per week.

An anti-Communist 'Christmas' play about trees

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Despite its title, the play Christmas at the Ivanovs is not about Christmas.

"It will not turn anyone against the idea of a statutory holiday on Christmas," says Arkady Spivak, the play's producer. "The original title is Birch Trees at the Ivanovs, because that's what it is about – trees, not Christmas."

The play, an anti-Communist drama that takes place on Christmas Eve, was written by non-Jewish playwright Aleksander Vvedensky (1900-1941). Spivak and his theatre group, Talk is Free Theatre, have adapted it to include work from Jewish short story writer Daniel Kharms (1905-1942), a member of the same Russian theatre group as Vvedensky. Both writers died in the purge ordered by Josef Stalin.

The new adaptation, running from Feb. 14 to March 2 at the Poor Alex Theatre, marks the first time the play is being performed in North America. There are 8 p.m. shows every night of the run. Two-for-one tickets are available for midnight performances on Saturdays and Valentine's Day.

Spivak, a Russia Jew who came to Canada in 1990 at 15, said the political content of the drama will not be above the heads of the audience, even though no names are mentioned and the country is referred to only as "the state."

"During the Communist regime, from 1917 to 1990, any references to religion, including the Jewish one, had to be hidden," Spivak, 27, said. "Christmas at the Ivanovs is an attempt to show that people in artistic and other groups disappeared without explanation in those days."

In the play, seven of the 20 characters (played by 10 actors) disappear, presumably to be killed. "It is not a family show – I would not recommend it for children," Spivak said.

Arkady Spivak

But, he added, "it has a lot of comic touches inspired by commedia dell'arte techniques. It is almost like Monty Python... It combines the European Theatre of the Absurd with certain improvisational features of the TV series Whose Line Is It Anyway?"

In fact, Spivak said, audiences may hear different; improvised lines from night to night. Yet the play, whose cast is mainly from George Brown College's theatre school, is not experimental, he said.

"It has a lot of Jewish themes – for example, the fate of small people, like Tevya the dairyman, in Sholom Aleichem's play [Fiddler on the Roof]," he said.

A talkback session follows each show at Insomnia Restaurant Cyber Bar, 583 Bloor St W., at Bathurst Street.

Actress a little schizophrenic playing five women on stage

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Community musical theatre actress Julie Lennick's busy schedule as a communications operator for Toronto Police Services only enables her to act in one play per year. But this year's choice of The Civic Light Opera Company's production of Stop The World, I Want To Get Off allows her to perform five different roles.

Stop The World, I Want To Get Off written and originally performed by Anthony Newely, co-stars this production's director Joe Cascone. The story centres on an "Everyman" character called Littlechap and his life, loves and pursuit of success and happiness. During his world travels he meets and falls in love with a number of women, all played by Lennick, 46.

"There's sort of a Greek chorus behind Littlechap helping to tell the story," she says. "I play all the women in his life. All the characters have a slight variation in appearance, but the accents are different. I've had to learn them. It was difficult, but now that I have the words, I can have fun, play with them and work with each character separately. It is going well, but I am worried about thinking who am I now – I'm feeling a little schizophrenic," she says.

This is her fifth production with the Civic Light Opera Company since joining in 1987.

The Tony Award-winning musical co-written by Newely and Leslie Bricusse features the famous song What Kind Of Fool Am I?

Lennick was born into the arts – quite literally – when her parents Sylvia and Ben Lennick of Wayne & Shuster and The Trouble With Tracy television fame were broadcasting their CBC radio show At Home With The Lennicks.

"I was brought up in the arts, so it was second nature to me to keep doing it. My parents met in theatre, they had their own theatre - Belmont Theatre Productions and they took over the Central Library Theatre. They produced their own shows and my father taught acting for years. I inherited so much and through osmosis got a lot," adds Lennick.

Her brothers also followed their parents into the arts. Michael is a television producer and David works in the recording industry.

Lennick studied theatre, voice and dance throughout her life, including taking a musical theatre course at the Jewish Community Centre on Bathurst Street.

"I considered going into acting professionally – had the opportunities. I guess in the back of my mind, I knew, it was going to be so difficult to do it and be able to maintain the lifestyle that I wanted. Doing community theatre is rewarding enough to me.

"I've been in community theatre for almost 20 years. My favourite roles would be Adelaide in Guys & Dolls, Sally Bowles in Cabaret, Mazeppa in Gypsy and Rizzo in Grease," says Lennick.

Lennick has also lent her talents to the community groups – Like Magic Productions, Scarborough Music Theatre and York-Weston Players.

Stop The World...runs at the Fairview Library Theatre, 35 Fairview Mall Drive, North York on Feb. 22, 23, 24, March 1 and 2. For more information and tickets call 416-469-8450.

Artist's exhibit commemorates Unmarked Lives

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — A visit in 1997 by Montreal-born Joanne Soroka with her Jewish father and Scottish Japanese mother to the Lithuanian shtetl of Seda, birthplace of her paternal grandfather, was the catalyst for Unmarked Lives.

The touring exhibition of tapestries, textiles and paperworks, is at the Justina M. Barnicke Gallery at Hart House, University of Toronto, until March 7. Hours are Monday to Friday, 11 a.m.-7 p.m., Saturday, 1 p.m.-4 p.m.

Seda has a deserted wooden synagogue and its Jewish cemetery has only five headstones — the rest were torn out for use in building foundations. It was outside town, on farmland once owned by Soroka's great-grandfather, that local Jews were rounded up after Germany invaded the area. The young men were immediately shot, and the others were herded into a barn and killed within two weeks.

Taking no prisoners, the Germans killed 96 per cent of Lithuania's Jews.

Soroka, a weaver and tapestry designer who has exhibited in Europe, North America and Japan, was stirred by thoughts of her diverse forebears from Lithuania, Ukraine, Scotland and Japan. Unmarked Lives is her response.

These were not powerful, high profile individuals, she says."I wanted to commemorate ordinary people whose lives were often unmarked, to celebrate them."

She has done just that with loving sensibility in richly coloured, intricately woven and textured tapestries, digitally reproduced family photographs and fine paperworks.

Soroka's parents, both Canadian-born, met in Montreal and married in 1947. She diligently researched their backgrounds, travelling to the home countries and following immigration paths to Canada.

Her Japanese grandfather, an importer-exporter, came to Vancouver around 1905. He later went to Montreal, married a Scottish woman, travelled back and forth between Japan and Canada and eventually moved back to Japan. Her Lithuanian and Ukrainian grandparents and great-grandparents settled in Montreal in the 1890s.

Soroka's tapestries combine thorough research with her parents' stories and her own imagination.

Scratching the Surface (in wool, linen, cotton) shows a part of the scraped, over-painted and worn hull of a boat she saw on a beach in Lithuania, near where her ancestors started their voyage to Canada.

"The title, as well as the pattern, attempts to understand them, the place and way of life they left behind," she says. "The depicted detail of the boat symbolizes their journey and hopes for the future."

Another boat — on a Scottish shore — suggests the experience of her early Scottish family.

Chaya's Dream (Nightmare) depicts the story of Soroka's great-grandmother, who persuades her reluctant husband to leave Lithuania to escape persecution and before their sons are drafted into the army.

In Water Kimono IV, patterns on a huge kimono evoke ripples and shadows on the surface of the water. "The presence of the old country looms large in the eye of the immigrant even when it is far away," says Soroka. "With my grandfather, the strength of this feeling pulled him back to his homeland."

Digitally reproduced photographs of great-great grandparents on semi-transparent silk bring her relatives to life. Each is layered over a drawing associated with that person. Thus, her Ukrainian great-grandfather is seen with his tallit, her Japanese great-grandmother with pages from ancient family records stored in a Buddhist temple.

Soroka now lives in Scotland, where she is a tutor at the Edinburgh College of Art. The former director of the Edinburgh Tapestry Company and founder of Ivory Tapestries has a bachelor's degree from McGill University, a diploma in design from the Nova Scotia College of Art and Design and a post-graduate diploma from Edinburgh College of Art.

CHAT girls win Becker tourney

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The hard work – both on and off the court – of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) varsity girls basketball team paid huge dividends at the recent Israel Becker Invitational Tournament.

The host Tigers captured the sixth annual Jewish high school event, going undefeated and beating Philadelphia's Akiba Hebrew Academy 61-41 in the championship game. Yeshivat Ramaz (N.Y.) took home the boys title, defeating CHAT 56-45 in the final.

The four-day tourney is dedicated to the memory of the former CHAT player who was killed in an automobile collision in January 1994.

The 17-team co-ed field, one of the largest of its kind in North America, also included entries from Toronto's Yeshivat Or Chaim, CHAT's Richmond Hill campus, Hebrew Academy of Montreal, as well as schools from Boston and New Jersey.

The CHAT girls were resilient, rallying from a seven-point deficit early in the second half to finish the game on a 32-5 run.

"We just wanted to win so badly and we knew that we could," said tournament MVP Jessica Bogach, who played the entire 32-minute final. "We'd beaten [Akiba in the round-robin]. We worked as hard as we could and we did it. We were really a team."

CHAT girls won their second championship after their fundraising efforts over the past two months kept the tournament alive following a budget shortfall.

"They called alumni, businesses, held their own little events and raised close to $20,000," said Aubrey Zimmerman, CHAT's athletic director and coach of both the girls and boys basketball teams. "There was a bunch of kids who worked really hard behind the scenes to raise money."

Zimmerman, in his 12th year at CHAT, coached Israel Becker for one year.

Zimmerman said the total cost of the tournament was between $50,000 to $60,000, but there was about a $15,000 shortfall before the girls went to work. Any surplus will go towards the next event, tentatively scheduled for next December.

Close to 250 players, coaches, and teachers participated in the weekend Shabbaton, held in conjunction with the 39 games that took place at CHAT and the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. Congregation B'nai Torah hosted the Shabbaton and its members housed the players during their stay in Toronto.

"Beautiful, balmy weather, the Shabbaton was very nice, the kids' behaviour was excellent, and the games were great," said Zimmerman, describing the championship weekend.

Canadians vault into bridge world's elite club

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When it comes time to compete against the elite powers of international bridge, Canada is usually considered an also-ran, not much more than cannon fodder for top teams from Italy, the United States, Norway, Poland and France.

For Canada to win a world class tournament would be akin to France winning the gold medal in hockey at the Olympic Games.

So before they play the Marseillaise at the conclusion of this year's hockey tournament, consider that Canada has pulled off the near-impossible, shocking observers with a remarkable upset win at the the fourth International Olympic Committee Grand Prix, held a week before the Olympics began.

The World Bridge Federation (WBF), which sponsored the tourney and is lobbying to include bridge as an official Winter Games sport, described the championship as "one of the best played and most exciting finals of recent years."

Fred Gitelman, a member of Canada's six-man team, called it "a real Cinderella story," while his partner, Joseph Silver of Montreal, pointed out that the Canadians, who are all amateurs, bested opponents who are by and large full-time, professional players.

Other members of the Canadian team were Keith Balcombe of Oshawa, Gordon Campbell, Nicholas Gartaganis and Peter Jones, all from Alberta.

Seeded no higher than seventh in the 10-team event, the Canadians showed mental toughness all the way through, refusing to be humbled by the reputations of their higher-ranked opponents, Silver, 60, said.

Canada's best-ever performance at a world-level event came in 1995 when the team, which included Silver and Gitelman, finished second. But that group, perhaps more talented than this year's crew, failed to stay together, opening the door to a new crop of players, Silver said.

The Canadian contingent proved remarkably tough. When things went badly, they refused to throw in the towel, instead rallying themselves and persevering, Silver said.

That psychological toughness proved valuable during the round robin event but was crucial during the two playoff games in the duplicate bridge format. Finishing fourth after the round robin, the Canadians went up against the world champion Italians in the semi-final. At first, the playoff match did not go well, as the Italians jumped in front and took a 44-point lead.

"At the half-way mark, the odds against Canada were 100 to one," said Gitelman, "so we had this amazing come from behind win."

"We pulled ourselves together," said Silver. "This Canadian team had so much heart, so much courage, we kept on going."

In the third quarter, Jones and Gartaganis shook off early errors and narrowed the gap to 18 points. The last round was left to Gitelman and Silver, partners on the 1995 silver medal-winning team.

Gitelman, who writes a monthly bridge column for The CJN, and Silver, who practises law, "have a magic connection together," Silver said.

Gitelman made a gutsy bid for a slam, and the twosome, who have had success in the past against Italy, made the contract. Canada pulled ahead and hung on to defeat Italy by 10 points.

In the final against Poland – which boasts two of the best duos in the world – it appeared the stress of the semi-final would work against Canada.

"We were exhausted," Silver said. Nevertheless, Canada jumped way ahead, leading by 48 points at the half. The Poles whittled away at the lead – making it look like they were going to do to the Canadians what the Canadians had done to the Italians – and by the three-quarter mark, Canada led by only 17.5 points.

The Poles continued to make inroads on Canada's lead, and Gitelman and Silver, playing the last boards, had to defeat a Polish contract for four spades to ensure the victory. They did so – by a single card.

"It was a very hard fought contest," Gitelman said. "It's especially nice [to win] in that it was pretty much an unknown team… It was exciting to win it with these guys."

Also remarkable is that the Canadians all hold down day jobs while their top opponents make a living playing bridge. Even more astounding is that Gitelman and Silver rarely play together. The last time they partnered was about one or two years ago, Silver said. Even on his home turf in Montreal, Silver practises infrequently. He plays in three major North American tournaments every year as well as the Canadian championship, he writes a column for a couple of bridge magazines and he reads a lot about the game.

Fred Gitelman

To overcome their lack of playing time together, Silver and Gitelman have decided to "play a very simple, logical style, with very few bells and whistles," Silver said.

Gitelman believes Canada's showing will bring the country more respect on the international scene and the tournament may help pave the way for the inclusion of bridge as an Olympic event.

"It's a difficult issue," he concedes. "I've always been interested in sports and playing sports and seeing them only as physical contests.

"But bridge has things in common with sport. Bridge is played all over the world and it's a viable, competitive [activity] with physical aspects. You get tired out in tournaments."

The WBF has already been recognized by the IOC as a sports federation. Should bridge be included as an official sport in Turin in 2006, Gitelman and Silver can take credit for putting Canada among the contenders for a gold medal.

Germany humbles Israel in soccer friendly

By ASHER GOLDBERG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

KAISERSLAUTEN, Germany — Memories of Denmark were in the air last week, as Israel conceded goal after goal against a German side that let Israelis dream for 45 minutes and then dashed that dream in the most painful, crushing knock-out an Israeli team has suffered in many years.

In the playoff for the 2000 European Championships, Denmark beat Israel 5-0 and 3-0 in Ramat Gan and Copenhagen. Last week in Kaiserslauten, Germany tore Israel apart, 7-1, and witnessing the humiliation from the sidelines was Israel's Danish coach, Richard Nielsen.

For 22 minutes, Nielsen's charges toyed with the idea of pulling of a sensational upset and beating Germany on its own turf. In the 27th minute, in one of Israel's solitary attacks of the game, Yossi Benayoun sent a crisp pass to Ilan Bahar, who stormed into the German penalty area. Bahar cut the ball back to Idan Tal, whose shot rocketed onto the crossbar, onto keeper Oliver Kahn, and into the goal.

When the teams left the field at half time, the crowd booed the home team all the way to the changing rooms.

Both teams underwent some sort of metamorphosis during the interval.

Germany was ruthless in the second half, and Israel capitulated entirely.

Netminder Dudu Awat, whose first-half heroics had kept the Germans at bay, was overwhelmed in the second, but the rot did not stop between the posts. The entire Israeli team was simply unequipped to deal with the German onslaught, and the home team could easily have reached double figures.

This is not the first time Israel has conceded seven goals in a friendly international. In 1986, Argentina beat Israel 7-2 at Ramat Gan, and the national team lost by the same score in Poland in 1959.

The match was originally slated to be held in Israel, but was moved to Kaiserslautern due to security concerns.

Spiegel said there were no reservations in Israeli sporting circles against Germany, noting that basketball and other sports teams from Israel had appeared in Germany, both at international and club level.

"Up until about 10 or 15 years ago, there was some resistance and prejudice in Israel, but I'm convinced that's not the case any more," Spiegel said. "Israelis are especially enthusiastic about international sporting competition. They need them and seek them."

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

At the end of each year, my school has a semi-formal. One boy, whom I'm not really friends with, asked me if I would go with him as his date. I said yes, because he caught me off guard and because I felt bad saying no. But I was really hoping to ask the boy that I have a crush on. Now I don't know what to do. Can I tell the first guy that I changed my mind? Or do I have to go with him?

Indecisive dater

Dear Indecisive,

Ultimately, whatever you choose to do is your own decision. However, it is very important to consider other people's feeling when making your own decisions. Because you have already agreed to go with this boy, it would be very hurtful to him if you told him you have changed your mind. It is not proper etiquette to agree to go with someone and then back out.

Instead, why not suggest to your date that you go to the semi-formal as part of a group of friends. That way you can feel relaxed with your own friends, but still feel you are acting properly toward your date by including him in all the plans.

It is important to keep everything in perspective. The semi-formal may seem very important, but in reality it is only one night. If you are upset that you have lost the opportunity to spend time with your "crush," I guarantee there will be other opportunities. For now, just focus on making the night as much fun as possible. Sometimes when things don't turn out the way you have planned, they end up even better.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Saudi plan positive: Sharon aide

Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A senior aide to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has called a new Saudi peace initiative "a positive trend," but said Israel would not agree to a key provision – a return to the pre-1967 war borders – in exchange for pan-Arab recognition of the Jewish state.

"Under the assumption that what has been published is correct, it must be said that we're speaking of a positive trend," cabinet Secretary Gideon Saar told Army Radio on Monday.

"This does not mean that we agree to the demand for a return to the 1967 borders. It's clear that we won't agree to this," Saar said.

Last week, Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah gave details of the plan to New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman. According to Friedman, Abdullah said he favoured an initiative that would see the entire Arab world recognize Israel and fully normalize relations in exchange for a complete Israeli withdrawal to pre-1967 borders.

As a range of Israeli officials said the plan bore consideration, President Moshe Katsav offered Monday to go to Riyadh to help foster a deal.

Katsav told reporters: "I very much hope that if a Saudi ruler will not come to Jerusalem, he will invite the rulers of Israel to Saudi Arabia. We would be happy to go to him. If we were invited to Riyadh, I would be glad to go there."

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres was to leave Monday for Paris to further the Saudi initiative as well as the draft peace plan that he had forged in recent months with senior Palestinian official Abu Ala.

ISRAEL

Services Extended

TEL AVIV — Financial services giant Citibank has added to its presence in Israel, launching a retail banking service to go along with its corporate banking operation. The corporate banking service was opened in July 2000. Two months later, the bank said it planned to expand into retail banking by the second quarter of 2001, but the outbreak of the intifadah delayed that development.

WORLD

Demjanjuk Loses

CLEVELAND — A U.S. judge has revoked the citizenship of Nazi guard John Demjanjuk. The judge agreed with U.S. prosecutors who argued that Demjanjuk had fraudulently become a U.S. citizen after the war by covering up his past as a guard at several concentration camps. Demjanjuk, 81, formerly lost his U.S. citizenship in 1981 on evidence he was the sadistic Nazi guard "Ivan the Terrible" at Treblinka from 1942-43. Demjanjuk was extradited to Israel in 1986 to stand trial for crimes against humanity. An Israeli court convicted Demjanjuk of being Ivan the Terrible and sentenced him to death in 1988. He spent five years on death row before the Israeli Supreme Court determined in 1993 there was reasonable doubt that Demjanjuk was the Treblinka guard. He subsequently returned to the United States.

Sharon on Trial

BEIRUT — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and other Israeli officials are being tried in Lebanon for alleged war crimes. The trial is based on charges brought by 21 Palestinians and Lebanese over the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacre in Lebanon, a Lebanese newspaper reported. One witness said she saw Sharon watching through binoculars and personally directing the massacre. Sharon, however, was in Israel on the day Lebanese Christian militias carried out the killings.

Cleric Arrested

LONDON — A London Muslim cleric who allegedly urged his followers to kill Jews has been arrested. Abdullah Faisal, 38, was questioned in a London police station after his arrest last week. British lawmakers had called for action following newspaper reports that Faisal had toured Britain calling for the killing of Jews and nonbelievers. The London Times reported he was selling audio cassettes instructing all Muslim males to train for battle and calling on boys to learn to use Kalashnikov assault rifles.

Speech Irks Havel

PRAGUE — Czech President Vaclav Havel said he was "deeply troubled" after his prime minister compared Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority to Adolf Hitler's Third Reich. Speaking after Prime Minister Milos Zeman made the comparison during a state visit to Israel, Havel said it was unacceptable to take out of context "different historical experiences." Havel added: "Such emotive and simplistic statements can only lead to a further stepping up of tension between the parties involved in the conflict in the Middle East." Zeman said his comments had been misunderstood and that he never meant to compare Arafat to Hitler.

Closing Opposed

NEW YORK — Mayor Michael Bloomberg has opposed a city council resolution to close Palestinian offices in New York City. The resolution, which is still in committee, would declare the Palestinian Authority and the PLO terrorist organizations and close their offices in New York, including the Palestinian Mission to the United Nations. "As the host city for the UN, we have to, even when it is painful and disgraceful and disgusting, any term you want to use, we have to be willing to let anybody that the UN wants to credit, or visit them, come here," Bloomberg said.

Jewish Life is Expensive, Report Says

NEW YORK — The average American Jewish family with children must spend about 40 per cent of its income to participate fully in Jewish life, according to an American Jewish Committee study.

Sending two children to Jewish day school and summer camp, paying for synagogue and Jewish community centre memberships and making a moderate Jewish federation gift of $200 (all figures US) totals more than $30,000, according to The Costs of Jewish Living: Revisiting Jewish Involvements and Barriers.

However, the median income for a Jewish family with children is reportedly $75,000. The high cost of affiliation means efforts to expand participation in Jewish life are unlikely to succeed unless philanthropists underwrite more subsidies for low- and middle-income Jews, the report says.

Polish schools begin teaching Holocaust studies

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Schools in Poland have begun teaching the Holocaust as an independent subject.

Since the Polish education system was reformed three years ago, the Holocaust has been a compulsory, stand-alone course, said Piotr Trojanski, who co-wrote the new curriculum.

It is outlined in a pamphlet entitled Holocaust. About the History and Extermination of the Jews Within the Framework of Humanities Lessons in Post-Primary Schools.

"Before 1999, the Holocaust was taught as an event in the war," he explained in an interview. "Now it is recognized as a distinct subject."

Approximately three million Polish Jews, or more than 90 per cent of Poland's pre-war Jewish population, were killed by the Nazis during the Holocaust.

He believes the Holocaust remains an unprecedented event in the annals of history.

A 33-year-old scholar on the staff of the Pedagogical University in Krakow, Trojanski was here to attend a York University international conference on The Future of Memory.

It was co-sponsored by The Canadian Centre for German and European Studies and the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University.

Trojanski said the curriculum is designed for middle and secondary school students 14 years of age and up.

The syllabus places the Holocaust in the context of combating racism and anti-Semitism.

He strongly believes that students who are acquainted with its horrors are much more likely to be tolerant.

Since last summer, Mowia Wieki, the national magazine of the Polish history teachers' federation, has published nine excerpts from the curriculum.

He co-wrote it with a colleague, Robert Szuchta. It focuses on three basic problems: Why was the Holocaust possible? How did it happen? What can be done to prevent it from happening ever again?

Piotr Trojanski

"The Holocaust," he noted, "should be taught in such a way as to make students realize that it is still possible for the crime of genocide to recur.

"The effects of the Holocaust can be found even today in the acts of terror, ethnic cleansing and mass murders committed in various parts of the world."

The Holocaust, he added, "should not be taught in isolation from Jewish history and culture."

In pedagogical terms, the Holocaust has gone through three phases in post-war Poland, said Trojanski, whose PhD thesis was on the Jews of Cracow province from 1918 to 1939.

During much of the Communist era, its Jewish victims were described as victims of fascism, and their Jewish backgrounds were hushed up.

From the early 1980s onward, they were portrayed as Poles in what, Trojanski said, was a "process of Polonization."

This, he suggested, was an essentially blinkered approach.

'A chapter closes'

Last week, on an unusually mild February morning of this unusually mild Toronto winter of 2002, his family and some of his friends laid to rest one of Canadian Jewry's most revered and venerable sages.

Ben Kayfetz, a "towering historical figure," as Irving Abella described him, was 85. Striving constantly to bring us closer to the society of social justice envisioned by our ancient prophets, Kayfetz was one of the community's pre-eminent "public servants," a relentless, indefatigable warrior on behalf of the betterment of Canadian life for all of Canada's people. He retired in 1985 after an exemplary career with the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) that spanned some 37 years.

Among those who eulogized Kayfetz at the funeral were two people who worked with him, admired him, learned from him and, in their own ways, even emulated him to a certain extent.

I reproduce brief excerpts from those two eulogies. The comments provide for readers some of the intricate and moving detail of the passionate, colourful canvas that was Ben Kayfetz's life, a canvas of living history, a dynamic, kinetic, ongoing process of involvement each day in the ups and downs of trying to build a better world for others as well as for himself.

Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director of community relations: "Ben spoke with a quiet, gentle voice, and never did an unkind word about those he dealt with ever cross his lips. His voice was like the still, small voice of the shofar. It did not have to be loud to make itself heard. And yet, it was piercing enough to awaken even the complacent and the indifferent to the pursuit of justice. And it was shrill enough to shatter the defences of the bigots and the anti-Semites.

"He was one of the key fighters against discrimination and he centrally contributed to shaping a human rights culture… in this country. He set the guideposts for combating anti-Semitism and racism. He was instrumental in the development of legislation to protect society from the hatemonger. He motivated ethnocultural and faith communities to co-operate with one another, and he led the way in the building of solid inter-group coalitions."

Irving Abella, renowned historian and former national president of the CJC: "It was in the late 1940s… Ben was busily involved in the campaign of his life, which would change this country in ways no one could imagine.

"It was just after the war and a pall of anti-Semitism and racism still enveloped Canada. It was then that an intrepid group of young Jewish activists, in the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Jewish Labour Committee decided to shake off the traditional timidity of the Jewish community and to aggressively challenge the discriminatory practices that had for so long suppressed minorities in Canada.

Ben Kayfetz

"Ben was one of the architects of this campaign, and its strategist. He helped devise the tactics, wrote much of the publicity and lobbied politicians and journalists. He was, in the words of Pierre Berton, who wrote about this effort, key to its success.

"And success came quickly. In rapid order, the government of Ontario, soon followed by other provincial governments, introduced fair employment and fair housing laws along with other anti-discrimination legislation, culminating in the creation of human rights commissions.

"Ben and his allies had changed this country for the better. The old Canada – parochial, nativist, xenophobic, exclusionary – disappeared, and it in its place arose the new Canada we know today, a Canada of open minds and open doors, of tolerance, of diversity, of humanity, a Canada in which Jews and other minorities could take their rightful place in Canadian society."

Keith Landy CJC's current national president, placed Kayfetz's life's work into the context of the Jewish history of Canada: "Ben Kayfetz's death closes a significant chapter of Canadian Jewish history… He guided the Jewish community through some of its most difficult times, becoming both its voice and conscience. He leaves behind a legacy of leadership which present and future Jewish communal leaders will seek to emulate for the good of the community and for all of Canada."

All of us – those who knew Ben Kayfetz and those who did not – can learn from what he tried to achieve, and find in his achievements an inspiration for what we can do with our own lives, if we only want to and try.

Move to open Vatican archives gets 'mixed' review

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The recent decision by the Vatican to open part of its World War II archives is a positive development, but falls short of satisfying demands for unfettered access, says a Canadian specialist on the Holocaust.

"I have mixed feelings," said Michael Marrus, a University of Toronto historian, in a telephone interview from Siena, Italy, where he is on a four-month sabbatical.

"On the one hand, it's a step in the right direction. It's a good idea, and I want to encourage that process. On the other hand, I don't appreciate the release of documents showing the Vatican only in a favourable light."

Documents should be released on the basis of pure objectivity, he noted.

"The Vatican has a responsibility to come to terms with the Holocaust," he added. "All the records should be made available."

In mid-February, the Vatican announced it would release selected documents next year from 1922 onward.

The first batch will deal with the Vatican's relationship with Germany from 1922 to 1939.

This was a period during which Pope Pius XII – a controversial figure whom the Vatican wants to beatify in advance of granting him sainthood – served as the Vatican's ambassador to Germany.

According to the New York Times, the first wartime documents to be released will be those dealing with Pope Pius XII's charitable work with prisoners of war and victims of war, regardless of their religion or race.

But documents about the pontiff's policy during the Holocaust will not be released for at least three years.

Marrus, the author of The Holocaust in History and Vichy France and the Jews, speculated that the proposed release of some – but not all – documents represents a compromise between officials who want the archives to remain closed and those who want it to be opened.

"There are different points of view in the Vatican," said Marrus, pointing out it is not a monolithic institution.

The planned release of Vatican documents comes in the wake of the recent suspension and breakup of an international historians' commission established to study Vatican archival material.

The commission was jointly set up in 1999 by the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations and the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews.

The Jewish and Catholic historians on the panel, of which Marrus was a member, suspended their work after concluding that the Vatican would deny them access to post-1923 documents.

Subsequently, two Jewish panelists – but not Marrus – resigned, citing a lack of co-operation.

Scrutiny of wartime Vatican documents will inevitably turn on Pope Pius XII's role.

His pontifical reign began on the eve of World War II.

Some historians believe he was basically indifferent to the fate of Jews in Nazi-occupied Europe.

Still others maintain that he helped Jews in the face of Germany's campaign to exterminate European Jewry.

Seymour Reich, chair of the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations, urged the Vatican to clear the air and release all its documents, according to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA).

The JTA quoted David Rosen, the American Jewish Committee's international director for interreligious affairs, as saying that while the release of some documents was "an enlightened step," the decision "does not resolve" the basic problem.

What Can I Do To Help Israel Meet Its Crisis?

Dear Friends:

We all know Israel is currently facing one of the most difficult times in its history. The crisis is not only political but economic as well. There are things we in the Diaspora can do to help, including the following:

BUY ISRAELI PRODUCTS

- When shopping for food, look for all the excellent Israeli products in the kosher food section.
- Suggest to managers of your local food stores to develop a "Buy Israeli Products" week.
- Request many great brands of Israeli wine at your neighborhood L.C.B.O.
- Look for the "Made in Israel" label on items like clothing, shoes, beauty products, etc.

CONDUCT BUSINESS WITH ISRAEL

- Buy Israeli stocks on the NYSE and NASDAQ.
- Urge your friends in the high-tech field to explore relationships with Israeli high-tech companies.
- Develop software in Israel.
  Contact: Israel Association of Software Houses
  Fax: 972-3-516-1003
- Subcontract the manufacturing of products in Israel.
  Contact: Israel Investment Promotion Centre
  Fax: 972-2-622-2412

VISIT ISRAEL!

Remember, Israel is so much more than the images we see on T.V. If five million of our fellow Jews can live their daily lives there, we can certainly visit! We must do everything we can to help.

THE HERCZEG FAMILY

Conservative USCJ works to unite diverse factions

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A first-time joint convention among five subgroups of the Conservative movement provided an opportunity for a Canadian delegation of about a dozen people to meet with Judy Yudof, the newly elected president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ).

Paul Kochberg, president of the Canadian region of USCJ, which had 23 delegates to the convention, said the tone of the meeting was a "very positive indication" of future co-operation. Canadian lay leaders had been meeting with Yudof's predecessor, Stephen Wolnek, on an ongoing basis for at least the past year to resolve issues including determination and distribution of dues.

Rabbi Wayne Allen, of Beth Tikvah Congregation, was also positive about the meeting with Yudof, who is the first woman to serve in her role, calling it an "instructive and fruitful conversation."

But, like other Canadian delegates, he pointed out a "deeply felt problem" in terms of a lack of understanding of the Canadian Jewish experience on the part of the New York-based USCJ, compounded by the distribution of Canadian members into member regions.

The so-called Canadian region of USCJ comprises only Ontario, Quebec and eastern Canada. Other member congregations are included in geographically closer American regions. But at least one Vancouver delegate was in on the meeting with Yudof, and Kochberg said there are plans to keep in touch.

Like other Canadians interviewed, Rabbi Allen spoke of the American slant of the conference, which ran from Feb. 10 to 14 at the Marriott Wardman Park in Washington, D.C. and was attended by about 1,500 people. A session he attended on outreach to the intermarried cited only American statistics. But the questions raised were questions that rabbis here are also asking. "Are those who are intermarrying really abandoning the Jewish community? Or is love taking precedence, but the people haven't given up on Judaism?"

A more pressing question, it appeared to Rabbi Allen from the amount of attention it commanded at the convention, was the issue of people picking and choosing which parts of Judaism they will accept or reject, including synagogue membership.

That way of thinking contributes to the dilemma of choosing whether to spend time and resources on outreach to uninvolved and/or intermarried Jews, or on inreach to those who are already involved and belong to a synagogue, he said.

Ideally, both might be attempted, he added. "I believe that is something every synagogue has to answer individually. I believe the idea [of such discussion] is to start the thinking processes."

Among the major issues discussed at the convention were the future of the synagogue and the future of Jewish education, he said.

Speaking on The Synagogue of the Future, Steven Cohen, a sociology professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, pointed out that while there is a disparity in observance between Conservative leaders and the rank and file, recent studies show that more Conservative Jews are educated and observant than at any time in recent history.

The five-day gathering in Washington earlier this month happened amid concern that the movement is too factionalized and may be losing clout.

The fact that five groups – the congregational arm, rabbinic arm and three professional associations for synagogue executive directors, educators and cantors – came together at the convention made it "a historic moment," said Rabbi Allen.

"It took 100 years for this to happen, but there is a recognition that the Conservative movement will only succeed when all our different arms are working cohesively."

Among other firsts, an Israel rabbi, Rabbi Reuven Hammer, was chosen to head the movement's rabbinic arm, the Rabbinical Assembly (RA); and an Ethiopian-born Conservative rabbi, Yafet Alemu, was inducted into the RA.

The gathering was an effort to unite the movement, said Conservative movement leaders. Yudof said she had spoken with the heads of the RA and the Jewish Theological Seminary to discuss how the groups can work more closely, and that all acknowledged the need for change.

"I would suggest there's still a lot of work to be done to recognize the contribution each group is making," said Shelly Maerov, executive director of Beth Tzedec Congregation. "By no means were the resources that were together well and properly mined to get the best from their presence."

Maerov — who was associate executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada before moving to Beth Tzedec in 2000 – said the convention reminded him of the General Assembly of Jewish Federations (now General Assembly of United Jewish Communities) as it was 10 or 15 years ago. "I think [USCJ] can learn a lot from the federation."

The federation system, he said, has "gone a long way toward bringing many aspects of the community together under one umbrella when addressing issues."

He would recommend, he added, that USCJ recognize that there is a critical mass of Conservative Jews in Canada and plan sessions for those areas that are idiosyncratic to Canada as well as making general sessions more culturally sensitive and inclusive of Canadians.

As a first-time attendee, he enjoyed networking with his counterparts, and getting a sense of how Beth Tzedec is faring in relation to other large synagogues.

The synagogue was one of two Canadian congregations to receive Solomon Schechter Awards at the convention: Agudas Israel in Saskatoon received a silver award for publications; Beth Tzedec was awarded two silvers, for publications and adult education, and two honorable mentions, for programming in the areas of social action, and worship and ritual.

Dry Bones
ISLAMIC TERRORISTS ARE JUST "CRAZIES".
BUT.
HAVEN'T YOU HEARD OF MODERATE MUSLIMS?
SURE.
EVERYBODY'S HEARD OF MODERATE MUSLIMS, BUT...
UNFORTUNATELY, WE HAVE YET TO HEAR FROM THEM.

How they delighted in his murder

Authorities are convinced that Daniel Pearl was killed within days of his kidnapping on Jan. 23. His abductors, a previously unknown group called the National Movement for the Restoration of Pakistani Sovereignty, never intended to set him free. Nor do they much care about the "restoration of Pakistani sovereignty." They intended only one fate for Pearl: his death. Even the group's name is a cynical ruse, much like the pretense of negotiations for Pearl's release. It was all simply part of the grotesque, obsessive hatred burning bright red inside of them, a holy incense for the spilling of other people's blood.

It is now clear from all of the circumstances that Pearl's religion was one of the key factors, if not the key factor, in his abduction. Indeed, one of the people arrested in connection with the murder told police that the abductors were looking for someone who was "anti-Islam and a Jew." Pearl was not anti-Islam, but he certainly was a Jew.

Daniel Pearl

That may very well have been the entire purpose of the kidnappers' ghoulish, grisly enterprise: to be able to boast to their confederates and other like-minded radical Islamists of the death of a hated Jew.

How else to explain the videotaping of the murder and the "statement of identity" Pearl was forced to intone just moments before his death?

"I am a Jew; my mother is a Jew," Pearl spoke into the camera. The recitation of the formulaic, matrilineal proof of his Jewishness was clearly intended to establish beyond any doubt, for the benefit of subsequent viewers of the videotape, that the abductors had captured the "right" man, namely, the enemy, a Jew. Mere moments later, more in the manner of a a ritual slaughter and the execution of a religious decree than the punishment of a prisoner, Pearl was grabbed by the hair, slashed across his throat and decapitated. How his captors must have delighted in their act of "restoration."

We grieve for Daniel Pearl, his family and his friends. By all accounts, he was a talented, loving, good man.

The hatred that drove the kidnappers to find "a Jew" is part of the very same hatred that drives Al Qaeda and all such like minded groups, individuals and supporters to strike at the West and at western values.

It comes as no surprise, therefore, that Pakistani and western police are looking for Al Qaida operataives whom they believe to have been involved in Pearl's abduction and murder.

The outcry has been sharp and swift from the West and from the government of Pakistan. There has, alas, been no outcry, no denunciation, no condemnation, not even sharp criticism from any other Muslim country: Is it not time that we heard from them too?

Jews, vote for social justice!

I was shocked and dismayed after reading the letter in the Feb. 21 issue in praise of the Ontario Progressive Conservative Party.

By tradition, and through the teachings of the prophets, Jews have always had a strong sense of social justice. The Ontario Progressive Conservative Party, since coming into power in 1995, have, by their actions, proven that they should be condemned.

On the private school funding issue, for every child that leaves the public school system, the government will withdraw approximately $7,000 from public school funding. After five years, the parents of a child in the private school system will be eligible for a tax credit of up to $3,500. This provides a benefit to the government of up to $3,500 for each child who leaves the public school system in favour of the private school system. Is this good for the Jews, or is it legislation for profit? Perhaps the exclusion of Jews from being able to vote for the next leader of the party, and therefore the next premier, will help answer this question.

In the next election, remember how Jews were disenfranchised from this process, and cast a vote for social justice – anyone but the Progressive Conservative Party!

Speak 'truth to power'

I was very glad to see that the Canada-Israel Committee has lined up an impressive roster, including Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Foreign Minister Bill Graham, for its 17th parliamentary dinner and policy conference on March 6. I hope that amid all the wining and dining an important message will be respectfully conveyed: the Chrétien government's Middle East policy has been unfair to Israel and deeply disappointing to the overwhelming majority of Canadian Jews. Over the last 1½ years, in vote after vote, in New York and in Geneva, in the UN General Assembly and at special conferences, the Canadian government has not stood up enough for its good friend and sister democracy.

This government's supposed "even-handedness," its constant talk about ending "the cycle of violence," has failed to distinguish between Israel, which took huge risks for peace during the Oslo peace process, and the Palestinian Authority, which in September 2000 made a calculated decision to turn away from negotations and try to achieve its political aims through terrorism.

Furthermore, too many Liberal MPs and ministers have failed to repudiate all forms of terrorism as an immoral political strategy, preferring instead to indulge in the fantasy that some forms of terrorism may be legitimate. Events since Sept. 11 have shown that when terrorism is repudiated, all of a sudden countries like Pakistan figure out ways to stop their homegrown terrorists. The nice-guy, even-handed approach of the Canadian government has failed dramatically in the Middle East, helping to mislead the Palestinians into believing that they can accomplish something through violence and terror.

On March 6, the deep, enduring friendship between Canada and Israel should be celebrated. Prime Minister Chrétien should be greeted properly. But it is in fact a mark of great respect in a democracy to convey criticism and concern as well as support. If Chrétien and company walk away from the evening with no awareness of the anguish their policies have caused, here in Canada and the Middle East, the CIC will have failed in its mission. As citizens in a democracy we must speak "truth to power" – respectfully, constructively, but clearly.

CJC not suited to be art critics

So the Canadian Jewish Congress is taking on the role of art critic and, dare I say, censor, of the Canadian Opera Company. Because National Post reporter Tamara Bernstein felt so violated that a new wave of anti-Semitism was about to be unleashed on the Canadian public from this opera, the CJC now feels that it must look after Jewish interests in operatic productions.

What qualifies the CJC for this role? Do they know about art? Music? Opera? I hope they are familiar with Jewish history. The story of King Herod and Salome is not a pleasant one, as the opera illustrates. We Jews have had many heroes, but we have also had our share of villains, and Herod is certainly one of them. In fact, Herod's Jewishness could even be called into question. Herod was an Idumaenean, from the Land of Edom, a desert region of nomads to the south of Judea. His mother was of Arab descent. Today's rabbis would have a difficult time accepting him as a real Jew (he certainly was not a Litvak or a Galicianer). His reign as "King of the Jews" was marked not only by a great building program – Masada and Caesarea, for example – but also by tyranny and treachery. He had many members of his family murdered, along with other fellow Jews. Any attempt to whitewash the opera, making it politically correct by portraying Herod and his Jewish partners-in-crime as being less sinister, would be a crime in itself.

There are many more serious issues for the CJC to address. Leave art to the artists, and let productions of art reflect an honest history.

A young adult sees a special, complex community

By SHIRA KOGUT

A great deal of the attention the media has been paying to Argentina has been on its economic crisis and the emigration of its citizens, especially its Jews, but there is so much more to this very special Jewish community.

I recently had the pleasure of going to Buenos Aires to visit some friends I had met on the Birthright Israel/March of the Living trip the year before. My friends exposed me to the beauty of this 250,000-member community and I would like to share that experience with all of you.

The Buenos Aires Jewish community is the largest Spanish-speaking Jewish population. They are incredibly loyal to Israel and especially loyal to their Jewish identity. In my countless philosophical discussions with various Porteños (meaning someone from Buenos Aires) about religion and identity, I cannot emphasize enough the amount of times they said they would only date and marry Jews, despite the fact that they would only go to synagogue on the High Holy Days.

During my stay, I went to two Reform synagogues, Dor Chadash and Bet Hilel (www.bethilel.org.ar). I was very impressed and overjoyed to see that although there was no special occasion, both synagogues were filled to capacity. Dressed in whatever attire they felt comfortable wearing, from casual to formal, the congregants, both young and old, attended services and sang each prayer with kavanah.

Both evenings highlighted the beauty in the similarities that form the special, universal Jewish bond as well as the beauty in the differences between Jews around the world. I was able to participate and feel at home in both services because, like services around the world, the prayers were said in Hebrew.

After services, I went to my friend's family's house for Shabbat dinner (his father happens to be the cantor at the Dor Chadash synagogue and has the most beautiful voice), where I spent a wonderful evening talking to my friend in English, his mother in Spanish and his father in Yiddish. The next Friday night, I went to the Bet Hilel synagogue and after services, while talking with my friends, I realized that we were living proof of the universality of the Jewish ethnicity and identity. Here we were, Jews from different countries with different customs, languages and cultures, yet bonded by our religion, our love for Israel and our language. What we could not express to each other in either of our native tongues we expressed to each other in Hebrew.

The Jewish community in Buenos Aires has numerous Chabad houses, which can be found all over the city. While I was there, they had a public candle lighting ceremony for Chanukah. I cannot even express the excitement I felt walking into a local shopping centre to find a kosher McDonald's in their food court.

In addition to the Jewish day schools, the community also has a Hebrew school for children who go to public school but want a Jewish education. I had the honour and privilege of attending the Ramah program on their final day of classes before summer vacation, which also happened to be the 8th night of Chanukah. I was touched to see tears come to both students' and teachers' eyes when they reminisced about the program over the last year knowing that it would not be continued in the year to come. There are many reasons that the school will not continue its Jewish programming next year, but the main reason is that the community simply cannot afford to sustain the program because, like the rest of Argentina, they are feeling the troubles of the major economic crisis.

At the height of the crisis last month, hundreds of unemployed Argentinians marched in Buenos Aires demanding jobs. [RNS/Reuters photo]

The current economic emergency in Argentina is not the first crisis to hit the Argentine Jewish community. On July 18, 1994, a terrorist detonated a car bomb in front of a building called AMIA, which housed most of the community's organizations. The community banded together to help in rescue efforts and in order to rebuild the building. Now a memorial stands in front of the building and trees dedicated in the names of each victim line the street. I had the pleasure of visiting the Keren Kayemet Le-Yisrael of Argentina and watching as they prepared Jewish and Israel education programs for the 14 Jewish summer camps of Argentina and Uruguay.

This article is just a taste of Jews of Buenos Aires because it is impossible to explain such a complex community in so few words. It was such a delight for me to make this visit and have this experience. It is a mélange of the religion I am accustomed to, united with a Latin American character of passion and warmth. It is no wonder that as the community starts to feel the pressure of the economy and begins to move around the world they all feel the intense longing expressed in the famous tango song Mi Buenos Aires Querido.

Mission sees a community struggling to survive

By FLORENCIA ARBISER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — For Karen Shapira, the United Jewish Communities' fact-finding tour to Argentina last week made a deep impression.

"Two weeks ago, I knew the figures" of Argentina's economic crisis, said Shapira, chair of the Overseas Pillar of the UJC, the umbrella for the North American Jewish federation movement.

"But to be here, to see the effects of the crisis on the middle class" is something else, she said.

Shapira was one of a group of UJC leaders who travelled to Buenos Aires recently to evaluate the needs of the country's Jews – about 250,000 people – after Argentina's economic collapse.

Before the mission was over, UJC leaders in North America, in a conference call with mission delegates, had approved some $5 million (US) in emergency aid for food, shelter and medicine.

The funds, to be distributed by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, are expected to come from local federations.

Steven Schwager, chief operating officer of the JDC, welcomed the development, and said the JDC will continue to look for additional funds to meet the estimated $8.7 million (US) Argentine Jews will need in 2002.

UJC still needs to determine its total budget for the emergency, taking into account the increasing needs of the Jewish Agency for Israel, which is helping to fund the emigration and absorption of Argentine Jews to Israel. (Argentina was a major focus at last week's meeting in Israel of the Jewish Agency's board of governors.)

While in Buenos Aires, the UJC contingent met with local Jewish professionals who coordinate welfare programs, visited centres focused on helping Jews emigrate to Israel and met with religious and other community leaders.

They also met with ordinary Jews, most of them belonging to middle-or former middle-class families, who shared their stories and needs with the UJC visitors.

Though Shapira had read about the Argentine situation, she said the people she met in the welfare centres were not the kind of people she had imagined would be in such a situation – educated, hard-working members of the middle class who have become part of the "new poor."

Outside the group's van, Shapira said, people were begging and shops were closed.

She also noticed how much the leaders used phrases like "re-engineering" and "co-operation" in describing their efforts to help a community that has difficulty paying membership fees and dues to Jewish institutions.

"For me, one of the really important things here is to meet Jewish leadership, to see how they organize," Shapira said.

For Richard Bernstein, the co-chair of the UJC's Argentine Response Task Force, one of the most shocking discoveries was "how quickly things are happening.

"In a question of the last six weeks, there are parts of the Jewish community who started to have urgent needs," he said. "Some are uncertain about food and shelter for next week."

The UJC group also visited Emanu El Social Assistance Center, which works with the support of the JDC and Tzedaka, an Argentine Jewish social services organization.

At the centre, they talked to five formerly middle-class families, who said just meeting basic needs is a struggle.

Those talks made a deep impression on Schwager.

"They were clearly middle class, and now they have nothing, they have no hope. It is so hard to imagine," he said. "I think this is an emergency situation. And Jews around the world need to know about it."

The group also visited Comedores Populares Israelitas Argentinos, an independent welfare institution that provides kosher meals to approximately 90 people a day through financial help from the JDC.

"There are more people willing to come for lunch, but we do not have the money to feed them," a JDC spokesperson said.

The JDC estimates that it will need to assist 21,000 Jews this year – and, perhaps that many for many more years.

The delegation also met with Jews preparing to emigrate to Israel who were in the Jewish Agency office. The office is in the AMIA building, the central address for Argentine Jewry.

According to the Jewish Agency, about 4,600 people have inquired about moving to Israel since the beginning of 2002. In January, 210 Argentine Jews arrived in Israel, another 330 were to depart in February and 500 more are expected in March.

Both Jews staying in Argentina and those leaving need help, Bernstein said.

After touring Comedores, the group was on its way to the Hebraica Jewish Institution, a social and cultural centre, when a young student stopped them and told them about his lack of hope for the future.

During another part of the trip, the group saw a man, apparently looking for a way to survive, handing out pamphlets for Hebrew classes in front of the AMIA building.

"Hebrew classes for emigrants for five pesos" – approximately $2.50 – "each hour," the low-quality, photocopied pamphlet read.

David Sarnat, the Jewish Agency's executive vice president, who was on the mission, picked it up.

"You will speak Hebrew in two weeks. Guaranteed," the man said.

Bright light in a dark world

One of the more problematic situations on the international scene is the lingering tension between Israelis and Palestinians. Many have tried solving or at least mitigating this apparently intractable problem, but their success has been less than noteworthy.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I am glad to report that there is at least one notable exception. It is the Isabel Silverman Canada International Scientific Exchange Program, a charitable organization based at Mount Sinai Hospital and the University of Toronto, known by its abbreviation CISEPO. It has been conducting collaborative cross-border programs between Israelis and Arabs. Founded under the guardianship of the late King Hussein, it has been given one of the rare endorsements in current international affairs by both Israelis and Palestinians.

CISEPO has organized and sponsored educational programs that have brought Israeli, Jordanian and Palestinian academics and their institutions together in such towns as Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Amman, Gaza and Nablus. Canada, too, has been a locus of its activities that have led to the formation of the Middle East Association for Managing Hearing Loss, known by the abbreviation MEHA.

MEHA has thereby become the first of cross-border Arab-Israeli professional associations involving Israelis, Jordanians and Palestinians.

A noteworthy feature of CISEPO is the support that it has drawn from private parties, as well as from the Canadian government, which has become a partner by financially supporting this venture. Members of the steering committee are Canadian, Israeli, Jordanian and Palestinian academics.

The organization wants to be known as one that has pursued a slow but relentless, people-based, cross-border, cross-cultural incremental progress since it was founded in 1984.

CISEPO thus provides a significant Canadian contribution to a group that now involves more than 300 people and 52 different projects on the Israeli-Palestinian track. Because educators, researchers and scientists provide CISEPO's hands-on action, MEHA has become an example of how the essential principles of security, mutuality, acceptance, respect and trust can help to create a small ray of hope between Jews, Christians and Muslims – a model for the Middle East and beyond.

If you wish to know more details about this unusual and inspiring program, I suggest you call or write to: Dr. Arnold M. Noyek at Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto. A distinguished physician, he has become a key player in this latest effort at creating an environment of international co-operation that will, hopefully, bring important fruits.

Mah nishma? Don't ask

Mah nishma? Are you sure you really want me to answer that question? Mah nishma? It may mean nothing to those with no Hebrew, but in Israel it is heard constantly, as often as people in North America greet each other with its English equivalent, "How are you?" or the French ask, "Comment ça va?"

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

These days, however, asking someone in Israel how they are has become a loaded question, especially in Jerusalem.

Under normal circumstances (whatever that means in Israel), mah nishma elicits the same kind of banal, perfunctory answers that such a question usually does in other countries. But after nearly a year and a half of devastating Palestinian terrorism and with no end in sight, asking people in Jerusalem mah nishma touches a sensitive nerve.

On one hand, with so many terrorist attacks and so many people killed and wounded, residents feel thankful if they and their loved ones have not been in harm's way. Yet at the same time, no one is immune from the terrible news and pervasive sense of doom and gloom. Even in crisis-hardened Jerusalem, the collective mood seems to have sunk to a new low in recent weeks.

These days, to ask Jerusalemites mah nishma is to invite a wide range of reactions – extreme anxiety, gallows humour, religious belief, stoic determination, fatalistic resignation or a combination of the above. The answers reflect the extremely depressed state of the nation bedeviled by an enemy for whom suicide bombers are heroic martyrs. In the face of such savage violence, the psychological and emotional toll on Israelis – Jerusalemites in particular – is incalculably heavy. To say nothing of the disastrous economic fallout.

Life goes on, of course, as it must, but beneath the surface, Jerusalem is traumatized and shell-shocked. How could it be otherwise in a city whose downtown area was recently described in the media, following the latest wave of terror, as the "single most dangerous place in Israel"?

Jerusalemites may be a resilient bunch, but how long will it take to recover from this sadistic onslaught of suicide attacks, car bombings and shooting sprees? What will be the lasting impact on people confronted with the mass murder of so many innocent men, women and children? Has the cavalcade of carnage become so routine that people's senses are being numbed? How much worse can things get?

These questions spring to mind in light of the worst urban bloodshed that Jerusalem and the rest of the country have ever suffered. For now, answers and solutions are elusive. Far more apparent are the symptoms of an embattled society under siege, fighting a war of attrition.

The signs are everywhere in Jerusalem. People walk around with shock, disbelief, anger and incredible sadness, robbed of hope for better days soon. They are on edge, fearful of unattended objects, wary of Arabs in the city. Everyone is constantly worried about the safety of their children. The sound of sirens gives way to the worst thoughts. One turns on the news with trepidation. Getting on a bus, going downtown or visiting a shopping mall is an act of defiance, to be avoided whenever possible. And with good reason. Earlier this month, the country's top cop, Inspector-General Shlomo Aharonishky, presented some highly sobering facts and figures.

"We have just been through a year of violence and terror the likes of which we have not seen in the history of the state," he told reporters at police headquarters in Jerusalem. "But it is likely to increase in 2002."

Among the statistics he cited: last year, Jerusalem suffered 90 terrorist attacks, including 35 bombings and 28 gun fire assaults which killed dozens of people and wounded hundreds more.

Mah nishma? Maybe it would have been better if you hadn't asked.

The moral imperative

Shortly after the atrocity of Sept. 11, the head of Reuters news agency in London declared that his agency would not use the term "terrorists" to describe the perpetrators of this or any other evil act.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Stephen Jukes explained that this term is relative, subjective, and emotive – "We all know that one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter," he said. Reuters, followed by the venerable BBC and a torrent of other news organizations (including the CBC and most other Canadian media), adopted the terms "activists" and "militants." People who preach hatred, strap explosives to their bodies or hijack airplanes to murder as many people as possible became "activists," a term also used to describe demonstrators protesting environmental pollution. As a result, as far as the politically correct media are concerned, there are no terrorists in the world.

This Orwellian distortion of the English language was fundamentally wrong-headed. The cliché equating terrorists to freedom fighters is fundamentally wrong; these terms are neither identical nor interchangeable. Terrorism is one of the few terms in international law and common practice among democratic nations that has an accepted and logical definition.

According to this definition, embodied in the legal codes of the United States, Canada and other democratic countries, terrorism consists of the random killing of civilians and non-combatants for political or ideological objectives. While the terrorist regimes in Syria and Iraq may seek to divert attention by creating different definitions, this effort is clearly self-serving and lacks any moral or legal validity. Planes directed into buildings, suicide bombing in Israeli cities, and firebomb attacks in Northern Ireland are all examples of random killing of non-combatants.

By contrast, freedom fighters (defined as the good guys) do not use such tactics. They may strike opposing armies, communications centres, and other physical targets, but if they target shopping centres or schools, they are terrorists.

This definition, as in the case of murder, is quite clear and does not require deep thinking or extraordinary intelligence. However, to distinguish between terrorists and freedom fighters, or the use of military power to defend against aggression, it is necessary to make moral judgments.

And this is precisely what the head of Reuters, the BBC and CBC and other journalists and many academics are unable to do. The inability to differentiate between good and evil, aggression and defence, and the absurd claim that such variations are entirely subjective and judgmental, reflects a fundamental moral blindness.

Instead, many journalists, particularly outside the United States, ridicule the clear ethical distinctions made by U.S. President George W. Bush, and the labeling of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and his followers as terrorists.

Years ago, many European politicians and pseudo-intellectuals sold their moral souls to the devil, in order to justify business deals (and the huge kickbacks and side payments they bring) to oil-rich dictators and mass terrorists such as Iraq's Saddam Hussein and Libyan leader Muammar Gadhafi. Morality became irrelevant.

A few months ago, when the Arab and Islamic nations demanded that those gathered in Durban condemn Jewish self-determination as "racism," Europe and Canada were with them. In sharp contrast, the American government took no part in this very blatant example of international evil and immorality.

The definition of terms such as terrorism and murder are neither subjective nor dependent on particular political environments. Effort to substitute morally neutral words such as "militant" or "activist" to describe unspeakable acts of brutality are, in themselves, acts of moral complacency and constitute acceptance of the unacceptable. The terrorism of the Palestinians in their drive to destroy the State of Israel, or of bin Laden and Al Qaeda in their war against the United States and the West, are clear examples of unmitigated evil.

No grievances, real or imagined, can be used to justify the random murder of civilians with the goal of intimidating and frightening these, or any other, societies into accepting political or ideological goals. To paraphrase Jukes from Reuters, we all know that this unethical code of conduct reflects moral bankruptcy and is leading the descent into barbarism.

The Kirshner File

Iran's goals in the Mideast threaten Israel

On Feb. 11, millions of Iranians in Tehran marked the 23rd anniversary of the Islamic revolution in Iran, a historic but retrogressive event that transformed the country into a theocratic, Israel-hating state and encouraged Islamic fundamentalists throughout the Middle East.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The mood in the streets that day was distinctly anti-American. It was galvanized by U.S. President George W. Bush's recent denunciation of Iran as an "axis of evil" nation. He claims that Iran is trying to develop nuclear, chemical and biological weapons of mass destruction. And he has accused Iran of supporting groups – Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah – that the United States considers practitioners of terrorism.

But for all the anti-American fervour coursing through the crowds earlier this month, Iran's reformist president, Mohammed Khatami, turned his wrath on Israel. Iran, he declared in a speech, desired détente and peaceful relations with all states in the world but Israel.

By singling it out, Khatami made it crystal clear that Iran has no intention whatsoever of reconsidering its hostile policy toward the Jewish State, and that when it comes to Israel, Iran's moderate and conservative factions, which rule the country together in an uneasy partnership, are in total agreement.

Of late, Iran has escalated its rhetoric against Israel, and Israel has responded vigorously, touching off a war of words between the two countries.

The tension was exacerbated by plausible reports that Iran was involved in a plot by the Palestinian Authority (PA) to smuggle 50 tons of weapons, munitions and explosives into the Gaza Strip on board the freighter the Karine-A, loaded on the Iranian Persian Gulf island of Kish.

The Karine-A affair, which has heightened suspicions of Palestinian intentions toward Israel and clouded the Palestinians' already bumpy relations with the United States, has raised alarms that Iran is attempting to form a strategic alliance with the PA.

PA president Yasser Arafat offered assurances to the United States two weeks ago that he has no plans to cozy up to Iran. But Israel, for good reason, is broadly concerned. Speaking to the Knesset defence committee recently, Shaul Mofaz, Israel's chief of staff, declared that Iran poses three major threats to Israel:

Iran wants to build non-conventional weapons and long-range missiles, both of which could pose a threat to Israel's very existence. Iran has stepped up support of Hezbollah in a bid to inflame Israel's northern border with Lebanon. Iran continues to back Hamas and Islamic Jihad so as to torpedo what still remains of the battered Oslo peace process.

And, as Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon warned in January, Iran is making an effort to stir up Israel's somewhat restive Arab minority, still reeling from the deaths of 13 Israeli Arabs at the hands of police forces in October 2000.

Jordan's monarch, King Abdullah II, has also issued a troubling warning about Tehran's meddling, saying that Iran has tried to carry out attacks against Israel from Jordanian territory.

According to Mofaz, Iran will acquire non-conventional weapons of mass destruction within three years. At a recent U.S. Senate hearing, George Tenet, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, estimated that Iran is attempting to produce "various types of weapons – chemical, biological and nuclear – and their delivery systems."

Expanding on his warning, Tenet said that Iran is about five years away from producing enough fissile material for a nuclear device, and is exerting immense efforts to buy advanced weapons technology from abroad. Iran's foreign minister, Kamal Kharazzi, denies that Tehran is seeking weapons of mass destruction.

Keeping in mind Israel's 1981 bombardment of Iraq's nuclear reactor, Jane's Intelligence Review, normally a reliable source, predicted recently that Israel will almost certainly launch a pre-emptive attack on Iran's nuclear infrastructure. With Russia's help, Iran is currently building a nuclear power plant, supposedly for peaceful uses, near the port of Bushehr.

Truculently reacting to the Jane's report, Iran's defence minister, Ali Shamkhani, said: "If Israel carries out any military action against Iran, the response will be beyond the imagination of any Israeli politician." Israel says it has no interest in attacking Iran.

Ali Hashemi Rafsanjani, Iran's former Iranian president, touched off the sabre-rattling by insinuating that Iran possessed the capacity to annihilate Israel with nuclear weapons. In the Shahab missile, Iran certainly may have a viable delivery system.

When Shimon Peres, Israel's foreign minister, complained to the United Nations (UN) about his inflammatory comment, Rafsanjani said his remark had been misinterpreted.

Iran certainly opposes Israeli statehood. In a recent speech, Iran's supreme ruler and leader of its hardline faction, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, called for Israel's destruction. He described Israel as "a malignant tumor that must be pulled from out of the Islamic soil."

Khamenei's invective underlined the fact that Iran has morphed into Israel's arch-enemy since the Islamic revolution. Prior to 1979, Israel and Iran maintained a cordial, if low-key, relationship.

Iran's involvement in Lebanese affairs also concerns Israel. Iran's Revolutionary Guards have been stationed in the Bekaa Valley since Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, training Hezbollah recruits. Imad Mugniyah, a leading Hezbollah functionary, has close ties with Iran. He is believed to have been behind the 1983 bombings of the United States embassy and U.S. Marine compound in Beirut, and the 1984 murder of William Buckley, the Central Intelligence Agency station chief in Lebanon.

Since Israel's withdrawal from southern Lebanon in May 2000, Iran has reportedly been encouraging Hezbollah to mount attacks against Israeli forces in the Har Dov region, claimed by Lebanon but certified as Syrian territory by the UN.

Claiming it has turned Lebanon into a "powder keg," Peres recently accused Iran of supplying Hezbollah with some 10,000 rockets, some with a range of 70 kilometres, far enough to hit Haifa and its suburbs.

Several weeks ago, Hezbollah lobbed rockets into Israeli army positions in Har Dov. And since then, Hezbollah has fired on Israeli fighter jets patrolling the area close to Israel's border.

These tensions notwithstanding, Syria – Iran's ally – more or less keeps Hezbollah in check, fearing Israeli retaliation. Last year, following Hezbollah shelling of Har Dov, the Israeli air force destroyed two Syrian radar stations in Lebanon.

In addition, Iran is funding and encouraging Hamas and Islamic Jihad, both of which oppose the Oslo peace process and Israel's existence. Khatami, Iran's president, once said that Iran would not interfere in Israel's eforts to reach an accommodation with the Palestinians. But his adversaries – who control the defence and foreign ministries and who recently refused to accredit Britain's ambassador-designate because he is allegedly Jewish – are doing their best to sabotage attempts to revive the peace process.

In a reference to the Karine-A incident, Ephraim Sneh, an Israeli cabinet minister, charged there is "a partnership of interests" between Iran and the PA.

Just as ominously, Iran is attempting to infiltrate Israel's Arab community, one of whose members set off a suicide bomb in Nahariya's train station last September.

Since the eruption of the current intifadah, 100 Israeli Arabs have been arrested on security offences, and 25 anti-Israel Israeli Arab organizations, most linked to Hamas and Islamic Jihad, have been uncovered.

Last but not least, King Abdullah II has told Bush that Iranian-trained Hamas and Islamic Jihad militants have been caught 17 times trying to attack Israel with rockets and mortars from Jordanian soil.

Judging by the evidence, it's abundantly clear that Iran is working assiduously to amass weapons of mass destruction, destabilize Israel's northern border, rile up Israeli Arabs, wreck any chance of reconstituting the Arab-Israeli peace process and drag Jordan into conflict with Israel.

It is quite an indictment. But Iran stands guilty of sowing tension in the Mideast.

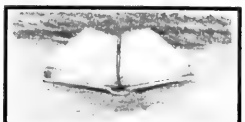
Picking up the pieces

By RABBI MICHAEL WHITMAN



Rabbinic Reflections

It is hard to imagine a greater failure than the building of the Golden Calf, as recounted in the Torah narrative that we read in synagogue this Shabbat. Just 40 days after hearing God speak at Mount Sinai, somehow the Jewish people dramatically stumbled. Instead of Moses returning from the top of the mountain with God's laws to teach to the world, Moses breaks the two tablets of stone – and the broken pieces reflect the broken promise of the people's loyalty to God.

What happens next is much more important for us. God teaches the Jewish people the secret of repentance. By truly regretting a mistaken action, by ceasing to continue travelling along a sinful path (and making amends to those we have harmed) and by committing to improve in the future, God is willing to forgive our sins.

And as a sign that God's forgiveness was granted, He instructed the Jews to build a Tabernacle, a building to be taken by the Jews with them through their wanderings in the desert. This movable structure would be the meeting place of God and the Jewish people. The most important object in the Tabernacle was the Ark, in which were placed the new, second set of stone tablets containing the Ten Commandments.

But our sages in the Talmud (Brachot 8b) teach a critical lesson. In the Ark were placed not only the new, whole set of tablets. The broken pieces of the first set smashed by Moses were also placed inside the Ark. The catastrophe was turned into a positive lesson for all time.

Throughout the Torah we encounter failure. The building of the Golden Calf is just one example. The Jewish people fall short of God's expectations at other times as well. Even Moses ultimately fails in his desire to enter the Land of Israel.

At times in our own lives, we all face failure – in our relationships, in our careers, in our personal goals. This is inevitable. And when we do, Judaism teaches us that the most helpful approach is to pick up those pieces and include them in the Ark that is our lives. When we allow our mistakes to teach us something positive, even they can be holy and merit placement in the Tabernacle of God.

Setting an example?

JEWISH EDUCATION The Next Generation

The educational philosopher Thomas F. Green writes that "the necessary elements of a moral education will be understood only in a setting where adults are able to say to youth with confidence, with clarity and for a very long time, 'This is who we are and this is why we do these things.' Any awkward hesitation or apology in presentation will spell disaster for attempts at moral education."

As any salesperson will verify, it is harder – but not impossible – to peddle a product that you do not really think works. As the gap between the pitch and the level of conviction widens, getting the message across becomes almost entirely a question of rhetorical skill or perhaps sheer audacity. Though the word "child" may infer naiveté, their acute and intuitive grasp of the teacher as charlatan actually makes the "sale" of religious education to children a very difficult proposition if one does not truly believe what one is proposing they should follow.

In the realm of Judaism, it is a cliché that such internal contradictions mostly bedevil the non-observant teacher, who must either avoid the halachic heart of the Torah or selectively bypass it and become privy to the charge of inconsistency or worse.

Though this dilemma is undeniably commonplace, I do not believe that a certain lack of faith or, in Green's words, a "hesitation" in conveying Judaism is limited to the secular parts of the Jewish community. For even in traditional or observant communities, the most striking disparity (read: hypocrisy) continues to exist between personal conduct and pious rebukes to children.

An example that springs to mind for me occurred on a recent Shabbat service in a large, local Orthodox synagogue. A father was seated in the row behind his son, who in turn was sitting next to his friends. The father's prayer routine was an all too typical and yet idiosyncratic mixture of occasional focus on the prayerbook, mysteriously interrupted by sudden and persistent bursts of dialogue with his friend seated a few seats away. This back an forth between siddur (God) and friend (distraction from God) went on forever. At some point his son casually began speaking to his friends, which brought an almost instantaneous reminder from his father to "concentrate on davening and don't talk."

I wish this story were apocryphal. And it raises for me some questions that I cannot answer: does this well-meaning and sincere father, who prays three times a day to his God, believe that such a God is less concerned with his talking during prayer than that of his son? And what is his son to make of God? Is God real or just a bit of a game that religious people play at, not so unlike the potential knights and dragons of the son's fervent imagination?

Finally, and perhaps most urgently from the child's perspective: are the adults in my world to be trusted in what they say to me? Or is the real truth to be found in their actions with their grownup peers, in which they reveal again and again, with brutally startling clarity, an uneasy ambivalence regarding the very same things upon which they tell me my world should be founded?

Lots of Jewish literature

Books
Bernard Baskin

Jewish American Literature, A Norton Anthology*, edited by Jules Chametzky, John Felstiner, Hilene Flanzbaum, Kathryn Hellerstein: Norton and Company, $55.

Fifty-five dollars? Yes, but even at that price, this hefty tome, the most comprehensive anthology of Jewish American literature ever published, is an outstanding bargain. Many readers will remember the various comprehensive Norton anthologies from their college days.

The four professor editors have judiciously chosen from a vast assemblage of writings that cover 350 years, from a plea in 1656 to Peter Stuyvesant, governor of New Netherlands, on behalf of equal rights for Jewish settlers, to a recent short story by Allegra Goodman.

The selections from the work of 154 writers include fiction, poetry, drama, letters and speeches – as well as song lyrics, humour and translations into English from a variety of languages, especially Yiddish and Hebrew. The selections are impressively balanced and surprisingly complete.

Many of the writers, in one way or another, call upon Jewish Americans to examine who they are, where they come from, what fate they share and what spiritual, ethical and other qualities they must cultivate as they make their way in a land that their fathers and grandfathers fondly called the "goldene medina" (the golden country).

The anthology is divided into five major segments in chronological order. For the period 1945-1973, under the heading The Golden Age of Broadway Song, the editors offer samples of the lyrics of Oscar Hammerstein, Irving Berlin, Stephen Sondheim and others. A section on Jewish humour highlights the wit of Groucho Marx and Woody Allen, as well as offering a cluster of Jewish jokes.

This is a unique volume. There is nothing vaguely like it available. It offers untold hours of reading enjoyment and provides, at the same time, an exciting literary journey through three centuries of American Jewish history.

Best Contemporary Jewish Writing*, edited by Michael Lerner: A Wiley Company $25.20 (paper bound).

Michael Lerner, editor of Tikkun magazine, rabbi of a "renewal" synagogue in San Francisco, and author of several well-received books on Jewish topics, has been hailed by his admirers as "America's pre-eminent liberal Jewish Intellectual." Even his detractors acknowledge him as a persistent, if annoying, gadfly and able defender of minority opinions.

Best Contemporary Jewish Writing is a treasure trove of outstanding fiction, poetry, social analysis and spiritual insight. His selections were made, Lerner indicates, with the help of "dozens of Jewish writers, thinkers, rabbis, academics and community leaders."

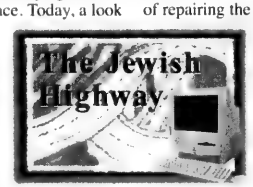
A helpful addition to the anthology is a "significant" list of 100 up-to-date Jewish books in English written since 1985. There are familiar titles by such luminaries as Aharon Appelfeld, Saul Bellow, Anita Diamant, Amos Oz and Philip Roth. The book also contains lesser known works by newcomers Ellen Frankel, Melvin Jules Bukiet, Benny Morris and Thane Rosenbaum.

Lerner plans to edit a similar collection annually. If they are of the same quality as the present volume they will provide a welcome tool for increased knowledge and understanding of contemporary Jewish literature and culture.

Tikkun Olam 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Unfortunately, we usually cannot go a day without being reminded of terror and evil in our world. So we mustn't forget that we don't have to look very far to find people who are trying to make this world a better place. Today, a look at tikkun olam on the World Wide Web.



Several rabbis and scholars have tried to define just what tikkun olam means, but there isn't a consensus. Rabbi Jeremy Schwartz of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, explains that when people use the term tikkun olam, "They usually are referring to a set of ideas and actions in the realms of social justice, kindness to others, and environmental health that are intended to make the world a better place."

Rabbi Schwartz says this use of the phrase is a recent phenomenon but that its roots can be traced to both the biblical concern for the weak along with the kabbalistic teaching of Rabbi Isaac Luria in the 16th century [http://www.kolel.org/pages/reb_on_the_web/tikkun.html].

On the other hand, Eytan Kobre writes in the Jewish law Web site that he is concerned about how the term tikkun olam "has emerged over recent decades as the catch-all description of choice for all manner of socially conscious activities, from old-fashioned charity to saving the redwoods to fighting Republican tax cuts.

"The most important battles for the creation of a just and harmonious society are not fought primarily through sweeping campaigns for national reform," Kobre says. "Rather, the building of a better world for humanity is best achieved through the personal campaign of each individual to engage in a process of repairing the flaws of his or her own olam kattan, that microcosmic world known as the human soul. The G-d-given tools for that task are the mitzvot, both the overtly ethical and the so-called ritual precepts, which, in fact, can be deeply ethically enriching as well" [http://www.jlaw.com/Commentary/PrePetals.html].

Arthur Green of Brandeis University writes that tikkun olam is mentioned in the Aleinu prayer that is recited three times daily. "There, l'taken olam means 'to establish the world in the kingdom of the Almighty,' or to bring about God's rule on earth." Green acknowledges that ideals such as the relief of human suffering and the protection of the planet from destruction may be a recent innovation, but he says these goals are rooted in a Jewish tradition that requires a concern for the "feeding, housing and health of all" [http://www.socialaction.com/wordsmatter.html].

In a fascinating essay titled "Tikkun Olam: Orthodoxy's Responsibility to Perfect G-d's World," Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of the British Commonwealth, asks why there is no body of halachic law for tikkun olam similar to that for Shabbat or kashrut. He suggests that it never evolved because "for 2,000, what chance did we have? For 2,000 years we were dispersed, scattered, exiled, we were powerless... who in the world would think of learning from us?" But he quotes God's blessing to Abraham in Genesis 12:3: "Through you all the families of the earth shall be blessed"; in other words, "Don't think this Torah that I am giving you is for you alone – it isn't. This is your wisdom and understanding in the eyes of the nations, because when they hear and see this way of life, this Jewish way of life, they will say what a wise, understanding people is this great nation" [http://www.ou.org/public/publib/tikkun.htm].

Repairing our world is such an overwhelming task that many people might decide it's not worth trying. Rabbi Aaron Bisno of Congregation Rodeph Shalom in Philadelphia tries to put the challenge into perspective. He tells the story of a teacher who tore a map of the world out of a newspaper, ripped it into many pieces and then challenged his student to reassemble it.

"The student dropped to the floor and, in short order, completed the assignment by correctly taping together each of the pieces of the whole of the world... When the teacher asked the student how it had been possible to reassemble the fragmented world so quickly, the response was short and to the point. 'There was a picture of a person on the back side. I repaired that one person and the whole world got fixed too'" [http://www.clickonjudaism.om/pages/tikkun_olam.html].

Next week, examples of tikkun olam from around the globe.

School board dissociates itself from anti-American article

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto school trustees have passed a four-part resolution that dissociates the board from a controversial anti-American article in a teachers' union newsletter.

The resolution, tabled by trustee Gerri Gershon at a board meeting earlier this month, is the first formal expression of the Toronto District School Board's collective view of the article, published in the December edition of District 12 Voice, the union newsletter for Toronto's public high school teachers.

The newsletter suggested the article, titled Why America is Hated, could be used by teachers as a classroom resource to explain "the seeming hatred emanating from the Middle East in the aftermath of the 9/11 crisis."

The resolution criticizes that suggestion, saying "a narrow ideological approach is unprofessional and offensive when teaching students." The vote on that part of the four-part resolution passed by a narrow 11-8 margin, with two trustees absent.

Another part of the resolution, which passed by a vote of 18 to 1, encourages teachers to address "controversial and sensitive issues such as the Middle East conflict in a balanced and evenhanded manner." A third section, which won unanimous approval, established a committee to study ways of helping teachers address sensitive topics in class.

A fourth clause that formally disassociates the board from the article and the suggestion to use it as a classroom resource passed by a 15-4 vote.

A fifth clause that would have cancelled internal courier distribution of D12 Voice was removed from the original resolution. Toronto District School Board (TDSB) staff had already taken administrative steps to do so, and those measures have prompted a grievance by the union, Gershon said.

Some of the trustees wanted to vote to distribute the newsletter, but the meeting ran late and there was no time left for that vote, she added.

Gershon first tabled her resolution almost three months ago when the controversy over the D12 Voice article first surfaced. The unattributed piece, which appeared previously in the left-wing U.S. publication Z Magazine, blamed the United States and Israel – beginning with its creation in 1948 – for generating "a deep seated sense of injustice in the Arab and Islamic worlds against the United States."

The suggestion the article be used as a classroom resource prompted angry responses from Canadian Jewish Congress, teachers and board members, who called the article one-sided and inappropriate for a classroom setting. TDSB chair Donna Cansfield read a statement at a board meeting distancing the board from "any type of unbalanced information presented in any classroom."

At the same time, school principals were advised by the board to caution teachers to avoid using one-sided and unattributed resource materials in class.

Gershon said that "simply by passing this [latest] resolution we've made a public statement that we will not take a narrow ideological approach to these issues in our schools."

The board set up a committee to study the experience of other school districts with a view to creating a set of guidelines for teachers, she continued.

The former North York board of education had developed a resource document that focused on the teaching of sensitive topics. The committee will likely study the document prior to reporting to the board. The board's latest resolution also contemplates soliciting the views of communities that might be concerned by controversial issues and providing teachers with professional development days and resource materials to assist them in the classroom, she said.

Congress declared it was satisfied with the TDSB vote. "The Toronto District School Board is to be commended for clearly drawing the line in terms of how controversial subjects should be taught," said Ed Morgan, chair of Congress' Ontario region. "We want our students to be intellectually engaged on all of the important matters of the day, but it is absolutely essential that teachers provide information to the students in a manner that is open and fair.

"Congress is also pleased by the board's commitment to continue to work with interested communities and to ensure that narrow, ideological approaches will be avoided in the classroom."

Gershon said some board members wanted to remove from the resolution a specific reference to the Middle East conflict. That motion was defeated by a 12-6 vote.

If silence is golden, then what is gossip?

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

It may appear old-fashioned to object to Gossip. Everyone does it, right? It's fun. Life would lose its zest without the thrill of discussing someone else's misfortunes. So what if the Germans call it schadenfreude — a "pig's joy"?

In family law, lawyers are often paid to formulate incisive affidavits or prepare a witness to give oral evidence about someone other than their client. This evidence is filed as a public document in open Court.

However, sometimes clients in family law cases use the opportunity not just to prove a point, but indeed to destroy the character of their opponent. Revealing a deficiency in the other party's parenting skills may strengthen their case.

But is it really necessary to generalize and imply or say that the same individual is a monster — a terrible father or mother? The father may owe the mother money, but does that make it okay for the mother to state that he has "defrauded me of my entire inheritance"? It may be crucial to show that your opponent earns more or spends more than he or she claims. But does that give you license to claim total dishonesty?

Grave sin under Jewish law

In Jewish law, Gossip (known as loshon hora) is one of the gravest sins. A Jew is normally forbidden by the Torah to say anything about a third party lest it destroy that person's reputation.

But is this kind of evidence submitted in Court "Gossip" in the way most people in modern Canadian society understand the word? Obviously not. Notwithstanding Jewish law, people are usually free to say anything they wish in Court to try to prove their case, even if what they say may appear to be defamatory. Even in a Jewish Court, a witness is permitted to give honest evidence about direct observations (not hearesay) if what he has to say is relevant.

Statements calculated to hurt

So why should anyone be concerned with some quaint, antiquated notion of "Gossip?" We're not living in Puritanical times, ancient Israel or Mea Shearim (the very observant neighbourhood in Jewish Jerusalem.)

However, many Judges and responsible counsel in family law have become increasingly alarmed at the extent to which clients unnecessarily exaggerate or complain about their spouse's conduct in these affidavits or open Court.

Master Cork is a Toronto judicial officer who for several years adjudicated many family law hearings. He often pleaded with lawyers to restrain their clients from attacking each other needlessly when giving evidence, especially when that evidence was submitted in writing. Children and other concerned parties often read this stuff during the dispute. This happens when a parent carelessly — or deliberately — leaves such written statements on the coffee table. Often years after the dispute is over, children or others will discover these damning allegations of duplicity, dishonesty, child neglect, abuse (physical, emotional and/or sexual), and depravity, which may be exaggerated or unnecessarily stated. Whether the statements are true or not, they are often calculated to be vindictively hurtful.

This practise is particularly reprehensible because it violates the unwritten rule that, in a visitation scenario, neither parent should speak ill of the other in the other's absence. So these statements do hurt — but they often hurt the wrong people.

The pain children feel when seeing their parents rip into each other is sickening. Yet not only do many fighting parents appear oblivious to these concerns, their lawyers often fail to advise their clients to adopt a more restrained approach.

Friends, relatives forced to take sides

It gets "better". The parents then "recruit" their friends and relatives into their own camp. These "significant others" sign similar affidavits or give oral evidence to prove their allegations. The friends and family members, who may have previously been neutral, are now involved in hurling insults and derogatory statements, not because they want to, but because they were asked to.

Unfortunately, it is sometimes necessary to obtain evidence from third parties that is relevant to a custody dispute. But unless the allegations are "documented" or focused with considerable detail on a truly serious allegation that a Judge must know about (such as child neglect), the process can be unnecessary and destructive.

Some of the allegations that I have seen in such materials are more than a complete waste of time; they trivialize the entire Court system. An unsupported allegation is one made without proof, i.e. without documents like a police report or a medical report. A parent who hurls this type of allegation may not be able to persuade a Judge. More importantly, if the allegation is exaggerated, the Court will not be pleased: it is a criminal offense to bend the truth in an affidavit or in Court. It's called perjury. Moreover, exaggerated statements will be considered Gossip — not evidence. Gossip can be damaging, both legally and spiritually.

Exercising restraint can be a mitzva

Restraint, on the other hand, can be a mitzva. As incongruous as it may sound in a legal context — especially a custody case — the exercise of restraint may allow you and your counsel to prove a point without annihilating your "opponent." Restraint also garners the Court's respect and immeasurably enhances the client's credibility.

I hope you enjoyed a freilich Purim.

ימים קשים

בשנה האחרונה, כל פעם שעלתה חומרת המצב בארץ, נשמעו קולות שהזכירו ימים קשים יותר, בעיקר את ימי מלחמת השחרור או מלחמת יום כיפור. אבל מה שקורה עכשיו מבהיל מעבר לכל דמיון. מפ"ל המשטרה פרקים בימים אלה מספרים שמוכיחים בעליל שמספר הפיגועים, מקרי הרצח ודומיהם הוא החמור ביותר מאז הקמת המדינה. כמעט שאין יום שבו לא נהרג ישראלי ממעשי איבה. אז מה עושים?

כשניסה אהוד ברק להגיע להסכם שלום עם עראפת "לפני שהכל יתפוצץ" עמדה לנגד עיניו תמונה שחורה שמתברר היום מכוונה. הוא גילה כמובן שעראפת אינו מעוניין בשלום, או שאין לו הכוח/ רצון לכפות שלום על אנשיו.

האינתיפאדה החדשה לא מושפעת מצעדי התגמול של ישראל, ולדברי נחום ברנע ב"ידיעות אחרונות" הפסיקה ישראל לאחרונה את החיסול הנקודתי של מנהיגי טרור כי ברור בעליל עכשיו שכל מעשה כזה מביא לתגובה של עשרת מעשי טרור.

הרעיון של הפרדה חד צדדית מושמע מפעם לפעם. מדובר ביציאה חד צדדית של ישראל ושל כל הישראלים משטחי הגדה, ויצירת חומת/ נדר גבול שתפריד בין המדינה הפלשתינאית לישראל. המכשלה הגדולה לרעיון זה באה כמובן מחוסר הקונסנזוס בעניין עקירת המתנחלים. בעבר היה הרעיון הזה "רעיון שמאלני" שנתמך על ידי השמאל הקיצוני הישראלי, אבל עושה רושם שיותר ויותר ישראלים סוברים שהמצב הנוכחי ורמות הסכסוך מסכנות את עצם קיומה מדינת ישראל. לאחרונה היסב חיז את תשומת ליבי לכך שהסופר אב. יהושוע פרסם בעיתון "הארץ" מסמך מסקם שבועה את כל הטיעונים מדוע ישראל חייבת בנסיגה חד צדדית מיידית. בגלל נקיעותו של הטור הזה, איני יכול להביא את כל הנקודות הקריטיות שמובאות בו. אביא אחת מהן שאנשים נוטים לשכוח:

"לא שטח המולדת הוא הנושא המרכזי של הציונות, אלא הגבולות שבהם ניתן לקיים את ריבונותה. וכאשר הסתיימה מלחמת השחרור בגבולות '49, ידע הציוני המובהק בן גוריון מה פירושה של ריבונות וגבולות והטיל את מלוא חריבונות הישראלית החדשה על כל השטח שראה אותו כשטח המדינה....מלחמת ששת הימים נכפתה על ישראל על ידי הרפתקנות נפשעת של שליט מצרים....אבל במקום לאמר לעצמנו בבהירות ציונית: כיוון שאין ביכולתנו להטיל ריבונות על השטח שנכבש, לספח את השטח ולתת זכויות אזרח מלאות למיליני תפלשתינאים.... עלינו להיזהר מאוד ולא להרחיב את גבולנו לשטח שלא נוכל לממש בו את מלוא הריבונות הישראלית....."

"לא לחינם נקראה מלחמת ששת הימים מלחמה יהודית, שכן אז, כמו רוח רפאים עלה היהודי הישן מתוכנו. חוצה הגבולות חזר לסורו ההיסטורי כמו בימים שהתיישב לו בכל רחבי העולם בתוך מציאות לא לו. כך תחל המעשה האנטי ציוני המובהק של התיישבות ללא ריבונות וללא תקוות ריבונות....."

"נוח מדבר של חלומות"

"הייתי רוצה להיות ילד בארץ אחרת, בארץ שאין בה הודעות על מות, פציעה ומלחמה". כך נפתח ספרה של ד"ר גרייס פוירשטיין Oasis of Dreams שיצא לאור לאחרונה. הספר מביא את סיפורה של התיישבות ייחודית, בה גרים ערבים פלשתינאים ויהודים יחדיו, שולחים את ילדיהם לאותו בית ספר, חוגגים את חגיהם ביחד ובונים חיים משותפים. נוה שלום עלתה על הקרקע ב 1972 ליד אבו גוש עם הרבה תקוות, פחדים אך בעיקר אומץ. חברתי הטובה גרייס, פרופסור בבית הספר לחינוך של אוניברסיטת טורונטו נסעה והיה בכפר. תצפיותיה ושיחותיה עם התושבים מובאים כמחקר נראטיבי בו סיפורי המתיישבים חושפים דרך חיים בה לבטים בנושא השפה (לימוד עברית וערבית), התרבות והארץ חופפים לממשיים ולעתים בלתי אפשריים אך עם הרבה תקווה לעתיד. אפשר למצוא את הספר החשוב הזה בחנות הספרים "בוב מילר" במרתף בניין הקונסוליה הישראלית.

גרייס, בת יחידה להורים יוצאי שואה מסיימת את ספרה בתקווה לשלום, בתקווה ששואה ניתן למנוע על ידי חידברות והתיישבות משותפת. נכון שעל רקע המצב המידרדר בארץ קשה לחשוב ללא סקפטיות על אפשרות שכזו...בנוח שלום לפחות מנסים.... את שאר קוראי

הנער הקורא

בטור האחרון דווחתי על הספר המדהים The Reader. שתי קוראות, אירית לפקין ופנינה הרל"פ תיקבו את תשומת ליבי לכך שהספר יצא בעברית תחת השם "הנער הקורא". אז רוצו למצוא אותו ומחכה לכם חוויה משחו.

Bar mitzvah: a time to celebrate and remember

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Josh Nightingale's recent bar mitzvah was a time of celebration and a time of remembrance.

Josh, who had his bar mitzvah at Shaar Shalom Synagogue, was symbolically twinned with a boy who died in the Holocaust before having his own bar mitzvah.

Josh's father, Howard, whose parents were Holocaust survivors, said the family decided to twin Josh's bar mitzvah after reading on a Web site – www.jewishgen.org – about a bar or bat mitzvah twinning program in Montreal.

Howard contacted Lisa Albert, a consultant for the Montreal program, to find out about arranging a twinning for his son.

Albert's research turned up the name of a boy, Salomon Schonfeld, who was born in Jaroslaw, near Kanczuga, the town where Howard's late mother was born.

The first choice for a spiritual twin, Howard said, is a family member who died in the Holocaust. If no family members can be found, then a family can trace its roots back to a specific town, he said.

If, as in his Josh's case, no child can be found from that specific ancestral town or area, the next largest town nearby is researched and a child from that town is commemorated.

Howard visited Kanczuga last August but was unable to find information in any archives about a specific child or family.

"In order to make the twinning a meaningful experience for the child, it is recommended that he visit a Holocaust education centre and if possible speak with a survivor about his or her wartime experiences," Howard said.

Josh Nightingale

At the bar mitzvah, a pamphlet is distributed to the congregation that contains background such as a town's prewar, wartime and postwar history, pictures or maps, and the name of the child being commemorated along with any information that has been discovered about him.

"It is an educational as well as a sobering experience for the child who learns about his roots and about the Holocaust, and about a very specific child his age or younger who never made it to this eventful moment.

"Regardless how much one has read about the Holocaust, this is very real; it has a real impact," Howard said.

At the bar mitzvah, guests learned about Josh's "twin," Salomon Schonfeld, who died in Auschwitz, and about Kanczuga, once home to more than 900 Jews. "It had been a lively shtetl for centuries, but in 1942, most Jews were gathered in a public square, marched to the top of a nearby hill and executed," Howard said.

"Today, there is nothing Jewish that remains. The cemetery has been over-run with shrubbery, unkempt and forgotten... two existing structures for synagogues have been turned into an office building and a strip mall."

Josh said he would like to see all boys and girls – girls are twinned with another girl who died before she turned 12 – celebrate their bar or bat mitzvah this way.

"I felt very good about what I did, and at the same time I felt sad for the boy who never made it to age 13. This gave him a spiritual chance to have a bar mitzvah.

"I feel very lucky to be here instead of being in Nazi Germany, but at the same time I feel bad," said Josh.

Howard is trying to establish a twinning program here through the Holocaust Centre of Toronto UJA Federation.

CORRECTIONS

In an article and accompanying photo cutline in last week's CJN on the Garshowitz family's longtime involvement with Hamilton's chevrah kadishah, the family patriarch should have been identified as Samuel (Shmuel Leib), not William (Zev Wolf). The article also stated that Samuel's sons became involved with the local Jewish burial society. In fact, the Garshowitz males are kohanim and thus could not take part in the mitzvah. As well, it was incorrectly stated that only post-menopausal women are permitted to participate in the ritual washing of deceased women. The CJN regrets the errors.

In the article, "Israel advocacy reinforced at weekend retreat" (CJN, Feb. 21), Ron Somogyi was mistakenly identified as president of the Jewish Students' Union (JSU) at the University of Toronto. He is actually JSU's immediate past president, having been succeeded by Aaron Kasman last summer. The CJN regrets the error.

Washington conference inspires young leaders

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — David Spiro was one of about 2,000 participants at the National Young Leadership Conference of United Jewish Communities (UJC) held earlier this month in Washington, D.C.

For the 39-year-old Toronto lawyer – one of 70 Canadians to attend – the best thing about the three-day conference, the 13th biennial event of its kind, was the sheer number of people who share his priorities and challenges, such as getting ideas for programming, attracting new participants, and ensuring that people are aware of the work UJA does locally and abroad.

The young leadership division of UJC and the 189 Jewish federations it represents is geared to young Jews, generally from age 25 to 45. An important component of young leadership programming is social, said Spiro. "Our focus has more of a social component, [as well as] consciousness raising and awareness, and education…It's very important – how to blend all these elements into a successful year and a successful campaign."

Next year – when his two-year term as co-chair of the Young Lawyers Network, a component of the Young Leadership Cabinet of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, expires – Spiro will make the transition to the lawyers' and accountants' division of the general UJA campaign, as is customary at the end of that term.

For Spiro, the conference provided inspiration for his volunteer work in the form of speakers who had been helped by UJA Federation dollars. Among them was a former jail inmate who turned his life around with the help of a chaplain whose visit was funded by UJA Federation.

There were also well-known speakers such as Joseph Lieberman, the first Jew to run on an American presidential ticket. "He's a wonderful role model of what someone who's Jewish can achieve in public service, without diminishing his Jewishness," said Spiro – who works for the federal department of justice – of the traditionally observant senator.

Among the more than 100 workshops that took place, Canadians met with former Torontonian David Frum, now a White House speech writer. Other speakers included Rabbi Michael Melchior, Israeli deputy minister for Foreign Affairs; Cokie Roberts, ABC News journalist; Omri Sharon, son of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon; comedian Richard Lewis; and even Ethan Zohn, who achieved celebrity only recently after appearing on and winning Survivor, the popular reality television program.

Joan Zafran, a 34-year-old Montreal accountant, met Zohn, who spoke about his Jewish upbringing, signed autographs and danced the horah with participants.

"It was fun and exciting," she said of meeting Zohn, but the "main thing [from the conference] was a lot of awareness of all the issues," particularly the situation in the Middle East and the political climate in Washington.

For Zafran, who has been involved for years in Montreal's Combined Jewish Appeal, attending the conference will translate into help with fund-raising now that she is back home.

She doesn't see the situation in Israel or the aftermath of the terrorist attacks in the United States on September 11 as making her job any harder. On the contrary, she believes that "the more we know that there are problems, the more we want to help."

"I think it's more important than ever for people to stand up and be counted," agreed Spiro. Although there were several sessions devoted to the aftermath of September 11, Spiro said he didn't believe that issue overshadowed the conference. "I think it was one element among many that played a part in people's awareness."

Ben Kayfetz: An observer of Canadian, world Jewry

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Obituary

TORONTO — Ben Kayfetz, respected writer, broadcaster, human rights activist, Yiddishist and one of Canada's most knowledgeable documenters of Canadian Jewry, died Feb. 15. He was 85.

For more than half a century, Kayfetz was a professional and lay observer of Canadian and world Jewry. He was considered by many to be a veritable walking archive and a wellspring of information on a range of historical and other subjects. His open-door office at 150 Beverley St. was a place where politicians, community leaders and individuals with problems or those who just wanted to talk came to seek advice, exchange ideas or initiate projects.

Born in Toronto on Dec. 24, 1916, Kayfetz graduated from the University of Toronto in 1939 with a bachelor's degree in modern languages. He taught high school in Huntsville and Niagara Falls.

From 1943 to 1945, Kayfetz worked for the Wartime Information Board, and in 1945, he worked for two years as a uniformed civilian for the Canadian Control Commission in post-war Germany. When he returned to Canada, he took the position of director of public relations at the Canadian Jewish Congress' central division. He remained at the CJC for more than 37 years, in 1955 becoming the director of the CJC joint community relations committee and, from 1973-1978, the executive director of CJC central region.

Kayfetz was also the executive director of the national joint public relations committee of Congress and B'nai Brith until 1984, working for the enactment of an anti-discrimination law in employment, fair housing practices, non-sectarian teaching in public schools and anti-hate and war crimes legislation.

Although he insisted he was not a professional historian, Kayfetz published numerous articles and monographs on the Jewish community. He served as president of the Toronto Jewish Historical Society, was in charge of historical research for the Toronto Jewish Centennial in 1956-57, authored Toronto Jewry 60 Years Ago, and was a frequent contributor to the Jewish Standard, the Globe and Mail, the Jewish Chronicle of London, England, and the Jewish Telegraphic Agency in New York City. He was also a regular commentator on CHIN radio.

Throughout his career, he was active in numerous committees on issues as wideranging as international affairs, Soviet Jewry, Yiddish, kashrut and Israel advocacy. In recognition for his tireless efforts in the fight for human rights, Kayfetz was made a member of the Order of Canada in 1986.

Kayfetz is survived by his wife Eva; daughters and sons-in-law Zena and Michael Tenenbaum, Tamara and Tim Kingston, Rebecca (who was married to Dick Hamill); and grandchildren Laya, Avraham, Elisha, Miriam and Devora.

Holocaust studies taught in Poland

"That's why Poles didn't know that most of the victims at Auschwitz were Jews."

Trojanski – a former history teacher – and Szuchta are currently finishing a textbook for teachers about the Holocaust. He hopes it will be published this year.

It will come out under the patronage of Poland's prime minister and minister of foreign affairs, and will be the only school text of its kind in Poland dealing exclusively with the Holocaust.

Turning to a related topic, Trojanski said that Poles of his generation are generally curious about Poland's Jewish past.

Prior to 1939, Poland was home to approximately 3.3 million Jews. After the United States and the Soviet Union, Poland had the world's largest Jewish community.

Today, he noted, there are anywhere from 8,000 to 15,000 self-declared Jews in Poland.

But, he observed, these figures do not take into account Jews who conceal their identity and pass as Christians.

Asked whether anti-Semitism is deeply rooted in Poland nowadays, Trojanski replied, "From my perspective, it's decreasing, especially among young people, who are very interested in Jewish culture and history. They want to talk about it. It was a taboo subject for years. Now young people want to fill in the gaps."

Trojanski, born in a village near Krakow, is a member of the Polish Society of Jewish Studies and on the editorial board of the periodical Studia Judaica.

Several years ago, after attending a conference about the Holocaust in London, England, he helped organize a series of seminars on the Holocaust for Polish teachers. These seminars, he acknowledged, prompted the ministry of education to introduce the current Holocaust curriculum.

In co-operation with the Polish-German Centre in Cracow and Anne Frank House in Amsterdam, Trojanski also created a travelling exhibition, The Jews in Poland, Fellow Citizens or Foreigners? It is now in Germany.

His own view is that Jews are, and were, fellow citizens rather than strangers in Poland.

"And that's one good reason why we should teach the Holocaust. Jews were fellow citizens. My generation thinks so."

Last year, in recognition of his efforts to document the Holocaust and the Jewish presence in Poland, he was awarded a diploma by Israel.

Peace talks must resume: Clinton

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israel should not shun Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat even though he made "a mistake of historic proportions" when he turned down the Camp David peace proposal, says former U.S. president Bill Clinton.

An interim agreement – with outstanding issues to be negotiated over the next 18 months to two years – is urgently needed to stop the violence, said Clinton to an audience of 2,600 at a benefit evening organized by Montreal ORT.

"The only possible solution" involves the creation of a Palestinian state, Clinton said. "After the divorce, [Israel and Palestine] should be friends and as soon as there is a property settlement go into business together."

The time is auspicious for a resumption of talks because the Palestinian "moderate camp" is dissatisfied, he said.

"The Palestinians now realize they did not make the wisest decision," he said. "That critical mass of opinion will be lost unless the two sides get back to the table."

The Palestinians' "traditional mode of operation of waiting for an offer and then waiting some more to get something better" backfired, said Clinton, who brokered the Camp David negotiations in the summer of 2000.

He deplored the deaths of both Palestinian and Israeli youths as "a slaughter of children because of the pride of their elders."

Clinton applauded Saudi Arabian Crown Prince Abdullah's recent condemnation of terrorism and incitement found in mosques and school textbooks, adding that Prince Abdullah is on the verge of recognizing Israel in return for a Palestinian state.

He urged the Bush administration to send back its Mideast peace envoy Anthony Zinni, and keep him there "until something gets done."

The evening was chaired by Dr. Roger Korman and grossed over $800,000, which will be split between the Montreal Children's Hospital, Ste. Justine Hospital and hospitals in Israel, where ORT students lead a computer program for kids facing lengthy care. Relaxed yet sombre, he received five standing ovations throughout the evening.

We need to face up to the discontent in much of the world, which is often directed at the United States, Clinton said.

"Our strategy against terrorism has to be more than defence, prevention and punishment," Clinton said. "We have to do something to make more friends."

The world would have fewer terrorists if the wealthy nations spent more money alleviating suffering and creating opportunity in poor countries, he said.

Wealthy countries have to close the gap in the standard of living between them and the large part of the world that has not benefited from globalization, he said.

For "a relatively small amount of money," he said, problems like unclean water, lack of basic medical care and education, and stymied economic opportunity could be alleviated and thereby reduce the likelihood that people will turn to extremism, ethnic and racial hatred, and violence.

"In an age of greater interdependence in the world that ever before, we have to make more partners and fewer terrorists," Clinton said. "For a few billion dollars, all of the kids in the world could be in school. That's a lot cheaper than going to war."

The United States also has to do a better job of "getting its story out there," especially in the Muslim world, he said. The rise of Islamic terrorism is due to extremists spreading the belief among the discontented poor that the West is "hostile to their values, way of life and economic interests."

The Muslim world should be told how many of their co-religionists live and thrive in the United States and how the United States protected Muslim lives in Kosovo and Bosnia, he said.

If people remember one thing from his speech, Clinton said he hopes it is this: "Do we want to live in a society that places more importance on our interesting differences or on our common humanity? It may be easy to say the latter, but it is hard to live it, particularly for the poor living under stress."

Israeli gymnasts coming to Canada

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For the first time, five Israeli teens will compete in an annual international gymnastics competition here that organizers say will give them much-needed international exposure.

The March 8-10 competition, called Gymnix International, will take place at the Centre Sportif Claude Robillard.

About 30 young, elite female gymnasts from Canada, Ukraine, Russia, Brazil, Mexico and France are also competing, said Thea Abisror, a mother of a gymnast who worked to bring the Israeli girls to Montreal.

The competition is being organized by Club Gymnix, a 28-year-old Quebec gymnastics club that's earned a reputation for honing international calibre talent since its inception in 1973.

The five Israelis are all members of Hapoel Tel-Aviv. Founded 30 years ago, the club has trained gymnasts who made the 1984 and 1988 Olympics as well as world championships.

The competition's events will include the vault, beam, uneven bars and floor exercises.

The Israelis will be in town from March 6-14, and will either be billeted with members of the Jewish community through contacts made to local school and synagogues or placed in homes of other gymnasts by Club Gymnix. Then they'll be off to another gymnastics competition in Canada – the Burlington Spring Cup in Burlington, Ont.

Abisror said despite the good news, Hapoel Tel-Aviv is struggling to find ways to cover the high travel expenses involved.

Supreme Court won't hear appeal by alleged Nazi war criminal

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Supreme Court of Canada has refused to hear a case involving an alleged Nazi war criminal.

Walter Obodzinski of Montreal, who once served as a member of a Nazi police unit in Ukraine, claimed he was too sick to face charges that he lied to get into Canada.

The Feb. 14 Supreme Court ruling clears the way for the pre-trial process in Obodzinski's case to go forward in Federal Court, said Terry Beitner, director and general counsel for the War Crimes Unit in Ottawa.

"The trial can get back on track," he said. "The parties [involved] and the [Federal] Court will establish a new schedule to complete the pre-trial steps," he told The CJN in a telephone interview. "It's reasonable to assume that the trial could get under way by the summer."

The ruling closed the last avenue for Obodzinski's appeals to delay or stop his trial on grounds of poor health, which date back to June 2000. At that time, Obodzinski's lawyers sought a permanent stay in the proceedings, contending that their client, now 83, suffered from heart problems and was too ill to withstand the rigours of a trial.

That bid was rejected by Federal Court Judge Marc Nadon, but Obodzinski's lawyers were granted a temporary stay while Nadon's ruling went before the Federal Court of Appeal.

In May 2001, the Federal Court of Appeal also dismissed the argument of poor health.

But in July 2001, Obodzinski's defence team was granted another temporary stay, this time in the Federal Court of Appeal pending the Supreme Court's decision on whether to hear a final appeal on grounds of health. That stay is now lifted in light of the Supreme Court's Feb. 14 ruling.

Beitner said before an actual trial date can be set for the Obodzinski trial, the parties involved in the case, in consultation with the Federal Court, will still have to establish a new time line for "discovery" examinations of evidentiary materials and compilation of witness lists.

Obodzinski is charged with concealing from Canadian immigration officials his wartime membership in a Nazi police unit in Ukraine, when he applied to come to Canada after World War II. The unit has been held responsible for murdering 4,000 Jews and partisans, and shipping 20,000 others to slave labour camps.

Accused war criminal turned back by U.S. at Dorval

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is repeating its call for the government to take action against Joseph (Juozas) Kisielaitis after the accused Nazi war criminal and current Montreal resident was blocked from entering the United States this month.

Last September, CJC and New York-based private investigator Steven Rambam made public a 130-page report about Kisielaitis, which they said provides "a powerful case" showing that he was a rifleman in a Nazi-sponsored battalion that killed thousands of Jews in Lithuania and Byelorussia (now Belarus) during World War II.

The U.S. Justice Department announced that on Feb. 15, its immigration inspectors at Dorval International Airport prevented Kisielaitis from boarding an Air Canada flight to Fort Lauderdale, Fla., because he has admitted to being a member of that battalion. He was not arrested.

At 6:42 a.m. that day, a U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service inspector who was performing routine pre-flight screening of travellers to the United States, stopped Kisielaitis, 81, when his name was found in the U.S. government's inter-agency border control "watchlist" database, the U.S. Justice Department said in a press release from Washington.

Kisielaitis' name was placed on that watchlist in 1984 at the request of the Office of Special Investigations (OSI), which had previously instituted deportation proceedings against Kisielaitis, charging that he took part in "Nazi crimes of persecution."

Kisielaitis has said under oath in the United States that he served in the battalion in a non-combative role as a tailor and did not accompany it on its killing sprees.

N.Y. Times: Israel would respond to Arab sincerity

In an article entitled "Dear Arab League" published earlier this month in the New York Times, Thomas Friedman suggested that if the Arab countries were really as interested in the well-being of the Palestinians as they claim, they would undertake a peace plan of their own, instead of complaining about U.S. "favouritism" toward Israel.

According to Reports

Couching his column in the form of a memo from U.S. President George Bush to the Arab League, Friedman writes, "I believe your problems with us grow from a misreading of Arab-Israeli history. You think somehow that if we just squeezed the Israelis they would roll over and do whatever the Palestinians demanded. You're wrong.

"The relevant balance of power is not between us and Israel, but between you and Israel. All the peace breakthroughs happened not when we threatened Israelis but when you enticed them. That is, when Arab leaders… made clear to the Israeli silent majority that they were interested in real peace in return for real Israeli withdrawal, they got exactly what they wanted from Israel."

Friedman is absolutely right. In June 1967, Israel fought a war of self-defence in response to Arab threats of destruction, following which it came into possession of territory. Israel has always proved magnanimous when it has received genuine indications that Arab leaders seek peace. Anwar Sadat's historic visit to the Knesset in 1977 led to the return of the Sinai to Egypt. The warmth of King Hussein led to the Jordanian-Israeli peace treaty of 1994 and other territorial adjustments.

However, Yasser Arafat is not of that ilk. He betrayed his initial commitments under Oslo (1993) when he rejected the offers of Palestinian statehood at Camp David in 2000. He further abandoned the peace process by resorting to violence and terrorism.

UN Security Council Resolution 242 calling for "land for peace" is the backbone of all Israeli-Arab negotiations. It means precisely that: Israel will yield land acquired 1967 in exchange for peace and security. But Israel is not required to cede territory without these guarantees.

The onus falls on Arafat to comply with Resolution 242 and to rein in the violence. Friedman appropriately calls upon the Arab League to accept Resolution 242 as the basis for a wider Arab-led peace plan.

(At the same time, we should note that Friedman inaccurately accepts the maximal interpretation of Resolution 242 where Israel would return to the indefensible June 4, 1967 lines that defined the cessation of fighting in 1949. Those who drafted the resolution foresaw important territorial adjustments.)

Israel was accepted into the United Nations in May 1949 as a Jewish state. The Arab-Israeli conflict would have faded away long ago if the Arab world had accepted the right of the Jewish people to possess their own state in their midst.

Unfortunately, as Danny Rubenstein, the highly respected Ha'aretz correspondent on Palestinian affairs, wrote (Feb. 18), although he speaks of a "two-state solution," Arafat, along with "Palestinians and Arabs in general," refuses "to recognize the Jews as a nation and thus to recognize Israel as the Jewish state."

McMaster student centre may pose problems

By AARON ORKIN
Special to The CJN

McMaster University students with special religious needs are discovering that the plans and policies surrounding the university's new student centre may make it more difficult for them to live and practise their religion on campus.

The Jewish Students Association (JSA) is among the groups that will be most affected by the move to the new student centre.

With the university expecting an increase in population of nearly 50 per cent in the next five years, more students means new special interest groups and clubs, as well as a renewed need for space and funding for student services.

Designed to house all student services under one roof, the McMaster student centre is nearing completion, as a part of McMaster's development plan.

The university has classified religious associations such as the JSA merely as clubs, without recognizing the specific needs of the students they represent. The misclassification of the JSA and other religious associations means that these organizations will have to share office space with all other campus clubs.

The Jewish, Islamic, Hindu, Christian and a number of other religious associations on campus are more than social, political, educational, or special-interest clubs.

These organizations create a space, both physical and spiritual, that make it possible for distinct religious and cultural groups to survive on campus.

Religious laws mean that many of these clubs will be unable to function properly or provide necessary religious services, thus alienating students with special religious needs. Under new regulations, all clubs, including religious associations, will have to maintain minimum membership numbers to keep their office space, thereby further undermining smaller religious minorities.

Policies like these will make it particularly difficult for Aboriginal students and very small religious or cultural minorities to maintain a space for their needs.

Numerous campus student groups, religious or not, have discovered they will have to move into the new student centre but can get no further information.

"I provide students with information, comfort, socialization — we even do chaplaincy," explains Judy Schwartz, director of the JSA. "I deal with both social and religious issues."

Schwartz says the JSA provides these services, as well as kosher food, and a place to talk to a rabbi or to meet other young Jews. She says she regularly receives phone calls from the concerned parents of prospective Jewish students to inquire whether their children will be able to find a place to exercise their religious rights, find Jewish friends, and be a part of a Jewish community.

The JSA has been on campus for 25 years, and makes it possible for many young Jews to attend McMaster.

Schwartz and the JSA have only been informally told that their office will have to be vacated, but can find no more information.

The JSA has not been told why they have to move, or for what purpose their current space will be used. The JSA basement office space, while it is perfect for the JSA, would not make suitable residence or classroom space.

Nobody has received a phone call or a letter to explain the situation. Schwartz has sent letters to senior administrators to inquire into the JSA's future, but she received no response and has had difficulty in opening dialogue with McMaster administration.

It would appear that administration is both neglecting students with special religious needs and creating a more serious long-term problem.

Administration must meet with student groups to openly discuss the problem before the moves occur, and it needs to find suitable spaces to meet the needs of religious associations.

Placing all student services under one roof might make it easier for most clubs to function and more convenient for students to access these services. But religious organizations cannot be conveniently lumped into a communal space with other clubs.

Islamic students have faced an uphill battle just to find a room where they can say their daily prayers. The JSA will be unable to provide kosher food in a shared space in the new student centre.

Some Ontario universities already offer kosher and halal food on campus and special scheduling options for students to work around specific religious holidays.

McMaster must realize that providing equal religious opportunity and building student diversity is not a passive process, but requires affirmative treatment.

We need to learn that being non-discriminatory in a religiously pluralistic society is not simply a matter of treating every group in exactly the same way, but actually requires us to attend to the specific needs of religious minorities.

On the new student centre Web page, McMaster president Peter George is quoted as saying that the centre would be an "investment in a stronger and happier student body...[that] will substantially enhance the academic and non-academic quality of life."

By downsizing the services that cater to students merely to make room for more residence spaces and classes, McMaster will increase its student population only to compromise the quality of life of its new students and religious minorities.

Fortunately, the problem McMaster has created here can be easily solved. All that is needed is to recognize that religious groups have special needs either by allowing them to keep their space outside the new student centre or by offering them special space in the centre.

The McMaster University Campus Plan, the document at the heart of all campus development, contains no reference to maintaining an environment conducive to religious equal opportunity or student diversity.

McMaster must be sure not to forget the principles of diversity, equal opportunity, and innovation when planning for expansion.

Aaron Orkin is a student at McMaster University.

CHAT beats Israeli juniors

The game, which the Tigers won 4-2, was one of several played in the Toronto area between the Israeli juniors and teams from the Avenue Road Hockey Association, City of Vaughan Hockey Association, Forest Hill Hockey Association and CHAT.

"All the games were competitive and evenly matched," said Eli Rubenstein, one of the organizers of the games.

"And in what other game will the announcer call a penalty by saying, 'and you won't do that again will you'"?

Rubenstein said the games, also organized by Jeff Budd, Moshe Eizenman, Alon Eizenman, Danny Fine and Marty Goldberg, and sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Israel Now and UIA Federations Canada, have been a dream since the Israeli team was formed about seven years ago.

"We always thought it would be great for the Israeli players to come here and see how the Toronto community supports them.

"They don't have much of a chance to compete in Israel, so this was a real opportunity for them," he said.

The team visited a number of Hebrew day schools, said Rubenstein, "and they were treated like stars. Kids mobbed them and asked for their autographs. In the kids' eyes, they were heroes.

"The whole visit exceeded our expectations. The Toronto community embraced the team, and the games were great."

Businessman Edward Bronfman, whose family charity is donating $25,000 to support hockey in Israel, dropped the ceremonial puck to start the game. He was joined on the ice by Israeli Consul General Meir Romem; Israeli Consul Zahavi ben Hillel; Sergei Matin, president of the Israeli Ice Hockey Federation; Paul Shaviv, headmaster of CHAT; and Moshe Eizenman and Marty Goldberg, chairs of the event.

Hatikvah was sung by CHAT student Tamara Tal, and O Canada by Jacob Gelcer, a student at Upper Canada College.

From the beginning, the teams were evenly matched, many fans agreed. Although there was not much body contact, the game was played at a fast tempo and featured excellent goaltending at both ends.

With a lot of passing, superb skating and playmaking flourishes up and down the ice, both teams displayed good hockey skills.

The end result of the game, though, was secondary to the fact that it was played with goodwill and good feeling, making it an enjoyable evening for the spectators.

Senior Sharon aide says Saudi peace plan 'positive trend'

Calling it a "fascinating, interesting new opportunity," Peres said Israel should immediately respond favourably to the initiative, while reserving the right to negotiate over the plan's provisions.

"The body of the Saudi position is more or less known to us, but what is important that for the first time Saudi Arabia, which had turned its back on Israel, didn't want to speak with it, didn't want to hear about Israel, is proposing to the Arab world normalizing relations with us and recognizing Israel," he said.

Asked if Israel should accept the initiative, Peres said: "On the initiative, yes. On its content, we certainly have the right to insist on bargaining."

Peres said the Saudis could not dictate the terms of a possible deal, but added: "The very fact of the willingness of Saudi Arabia to come out and try to bring the Arab world with it to reconciliation is a very great thing."

Sharon told cabinet Sunday that he has "taken several steps" on the Saudi initiative and is waiting for the United States to provide details of the plan.

Though King Abdullah of Jordan recently made a similar peace proposal, the idea is attracting more attention now that it has been raised by Saudi Arabia.

Jordanian Foreign Minister Marwan Muasher said there are "seven or eight" Arab states that have accepted it, including Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Egypt, Kuwait, Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates, Lebanon, Tunisia and the Palestinian Authority.

A senior Jordanian government source said if Israel allows Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to attend next month's Arab summit in Beirut, the plan will be the main issue on the agenda. The source added Syria is likely to back it as well. He said his country is working to win support for it, and that only Iraq, Libya, and Sudan may try to foil it.

Sources in Israel's foreign ministry believe the prince's remarks were prompted by three factors, the first being his desire to repair his country's relations with Washington that were badly strained by Sept. 11.

The second factor is that Saudi Arabia – like Egypt and Jordan – fears the violence in the territories could undermine the Saudi regime. Finally, Saudi Arabia seeks to regain its centrality in the region, after years in which its refusal to offer its own initiative has left it somewhat on the sidelines.

Prince Abdullah has been seeking publicity for the proposal. In Saudi Arabia, his statements received wide, and largely positive, coverage: The official Saudi news agency published Friedman's article in full, while the pro-government daily Al-Watan ran a favourable editorial last week saying Abdullah's "logical" proposal had been directed at western – particularly U.S. and Israeli – public opinion.

The United States is taking the Saudi proposal seriously, and last Friday Secretary of State Colin Powell called it a positive development. U.S. sources said it is significant because it comes from a powerful and influential Arab figure.

But a high-ranking U.S. official sent Israel a message last weekend, saying the importance of the Saudi initiative should not be overestimated and while it contained some positive elements, efforts should be focused on ending violence and terrorism, rather than an all-inclusive political proposal.

Israeli Finance Minister Silvan Shalom of Sharon's Likud was cautious about the plan. He said it bore further inspection, but that after 54 years of statehood, Israel could hardly view a willingness to recognize it as "a major revolution."

Saudi foreign policy adviser Adel al-Jubeir said last Sunday the basic tenet of Abdullah's proposal is that the sides should not wait for a ceasefire to start talks. "This notion of a three-day or seven-day or 10-day of total calm is simply not practical." He also said international observers should separate the sides and allow leaders to talk.

"[The proposal] sends a signal to the Israeli public by telling them that peace with the broader Arab world is possible. It also sends a message to the peace camps in Israel and the United States not to lose hope," al-Jubeir said.

Meanwhile, a Saudi newspaper quoted a "western source" that the United States and Saudi Arabia were working together to promote the plan. The source also said the Americans decided to back it due to the support it was winning in the Arab world.

Murdered journalist Daniel Pearl was gentle soul – and son of Israelis

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Until the very last moment, the family of murdered journalist Daniel Pearl never lost hope that he would be released by his Pakistani kidnappers and returned to safety.

Prof. Yehuda Pearl and his wife Ruth said in a statement that they simply could not believe that anyone could harm a son they described as "such a gentle soul" and as "the musician, the writer, the storyteller, the bridge-builder."

Elsewhere in their statement, Pearl's parents and his sisters, Tamara and Michelle, remembered their son and brother as a "walking sunshine of truth, humour, friendship and compassion."

The family's unflagging hope was best illustrated in an e-mail message the father sent to members of a local Israeli choir on Feb. 21, only a few hours before the U.S. State Department confirmed the brutal slaying of the Wall Street Journal reporter.

After nearly a month of torturous waiting, Yehuda Pearl told fellow musicians of the L.A.-Shir choir, which he had founded, "We have learned to cope with the ups and downs of the situation... We are confident that he will return to us and fairly soon. When that happens, we will all celebrate his homecoming event with Handel's Hallelujah."

He spent sabbatical year at Weizmann Institute

A San Fernando Valley rabbi who is also a practising psychologist has been counselling the Pearl family during the past few weeks. A private memorial service at the family home in Encino was planned for the latter part of this week.

The family's grief has been shared by a circle of Daniel Pearl's close friends, many of whom date their friendship back to school days in the Los Angeles area.

Some of his closest friends were fellow backpackers between 1978 and 1981 in the Explorer Post, a co-ed affiliate of the Boy Scouts of America.

One was Rachel Knopoff, now a Manhattan Beach, Calif., physician, who remembers Pearl as "the greatest guy I have ever known. I had a huge crush on him, and so probably did most of the girls in the troop. He was the funniest, smartest, nicest guy I ever met."

Attorney John Liebman served as adviser to the Explorer Post.

"They were an extraordinary, highly motivated group of kids," says Liebman, who recalls Pearl as "obviously highly intelligent, with a fine sense of humour and easy to get along with."

Liebman's son, Scott, a lifelong friend of Pearl's, added a few more descriptive adjectives in a phone call from San Francisco – including "brilliant, funny, wry and sensitive."

At Birmingham High in Van Nuys, Calif., whose current student body observed a minute of silence in honour of their slain alumnus, Pearl "was the teenager everyone wanted to be," observed the Los Angeles Daily News.

"He was the smart, funny kid who was a cultural counterpoint to the mall-hopping, materialistic 'valley girl' world of the 1970s and early 1980s."

Pearl grew up in a family that nourished the intellectual and musical talents he was to display later on.

After graduating from the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa, Yehuda Pearl and his wife Ruth, an electrical engineer, moved to Princeton, N.J., for graduate studies and to work at a local research centre. Their son was born there in 1963.

In 1970, Yehuda Pearl joined the computer science faculty at UCLA, earning a reputation as a leading researcher in the field of artificial intelligence.

He spent a sabbatical year at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel and was elected to the elite National Academy of Engineering in 1995 "for developing the foundation for reasoning under uncertainty."

One old friend recalls participating in a Passover seder at the Pearl home, though the family was not religiously observant.

"The Pearls are not affiliated with a synagogue, but they are deeply attached to their heritage and very cognizant of who they are," said Gary Foster, the family spokesperson.

Israeli newspapers reported that Daniel Pearl had celebrated his bar mitzvah at the Western Wall.

During the month following Pearl's kidnapping, there was deep concern that publication of his family's Israeli roots would further endanger his life.

Foster and other representatives of Dow Jones, the Wall Street Journal's parent company, worked intensively behind the scenes in New York, Los Angeles and overseas to alert news organizations to the danger inherent in publishing the names of Pearl's parents or their background.

"We were particularly anxious that networks reaching large international audiences, such as CNN and BBC, would not break the news," Foster says.

In a remarkable display of professional restraint and solidarity, all media complied with the strictures.

Sharon calls on Israel to 'stand united'

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — After much debate among politicians, military officials and pundits, Israel has decided to create buffer zones to defend Israelis from Palestinian terrorists.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon made the announcement last Thursday in a televised speech – mostly a pep talk to a nation that has faced nearly 17 months of Palestinian violence and sees no end to the conflict.

Sharon gave virtually no details about the buffer zones, which he said would be created "in order to increase the security of Israeli subjects."

After discussions "held at the Security Cabinet a few days ago," he said, "we decided to establish buffer zones and to set up obstacles along those border zones."

Though pressed by reporters during the question-and-answer period following his speech, Sharon did not indicate how the zones would be demarcated nor what might happen to those who might find themselves on the wrong side of the boundary.

Addressing a visiting delegation of U.S. Jewish leaders the day before, he said there is a "war going on here." But in his televised remarks Thursday, Sharon made less pointed references to the ongoing crisis as a war.

Israelis have to be "calm and have to preserve coolness in times of war and peace," he said. "We must not act hastily. Everything in good time, neither too late nor too early. That is the only way we can be victorious in war, and that is the only way to achieve a stable peace.

"We are a people that has accumulated a great deal of experience in dealing with troubles," he added.

His speech came amid calls from some quarters in Israel – including from a group of reservists refusing to serve in the West Bank and Gaza Strip – for Israel to halt its military reprisals.

Referring to these dissenting voices, Sharon said Israel's enemies "have misinterpreted our internal debates, which are the very essence of a democracy and which are actually one of the sources of our strength.

"They have misunderstood this situation. They think that there are cracks in our people," he added. "And of course they are encouraged to think that from the expressions of people calling for refusal to serve in the territories, but they are wrong. This people is stronger and more united than they could possibly imagine."

Sharon repeatedly spoke of Israel's yearning for peace with its Arab neighbours.

But he also reiterated that negotiations with the Palestinians can only begin after there is a complete halt to hostilities.

"First, terror must stop. There must be calm, and only then will we talk about peace," he said.

Sharon voiced his willingness to meet with Palestinian "personalities" in an effort "to prevent any escalation and to prevent a slide into overall total war," but added that there would be no compromises where Israel's security is concerned.

Ariel Sharon delivering the speech

"I said in the past, and I say it again today, for the sake of true peace, there must be painful concessions, but there will be no concessions with regard to the security of Israel and its citizens," he said.

Sharon spoke during a week marked by some of the worst violence since the intifadah erupted in September 2000.

Also last Thursday, Israel launched a land and air assault on Gaza City and on several cities in the West Bank in retaliation for the point-blank slaying of six Israeli soldiers earlier in the week.

About 20 Palestinians have been killed in a series of Israeli reprisals launched last week after the six were killed by Palestinian gunmen at a Ramallah-area roadblock.

In his speech, Sharon addressed some of his remarks to those "Palestinians who do not want war and who are not engaged in terror.

"Do you intend to go on sending your children to commit suicide as bombers?" he asked. "Or do you intend to follow those who suggest prosperity and advancement?"

Drawing a picture of a hopeful future, he said: "I suggest to all, Jews and Arabs like, that there must be calm. Stop educating towards hatred.

"What we all see here today is prosperity and advancement. And I know that in the end, with God's help, this is what will happen."

Jerusalem's Neighbourhood Network

It's a cherished city. One of the world's jewels. The capital of Israel. But Jerusalem isn't so much a city as a jigsaw puzzle of unique neighbourhoods, reflecting rich histories and distinct personalities. The next time you visit Jerusalem, try these tourist treats.

Nachalat Shiva – Bordered by Rivlin and Yoel Salomon Streets near Ben Yehuda, this craft-filled district originated in the 19th century. If you're looking for alleys lined with ceramics, hand-designed jewelry and small, specialized restaurants, you'll love Nachalat Shiva.

Agrippas Street – Forget about modern malls, Agrippas, which starts at downtown King George Street features discount outlets selling everything imaginable. If you're afraid of bargaining, beware. This is not the neighbourhood for you.

The Cardo – For the Jewish Quarter of Jerusalem's Old City, this is Main Street, where purchasing Judaica preoccupies visitors. Just ascend the steep staircase from the Western Wall plaza and you're there. Take a look around and you can see why the Cardo was the bustling central thoroughfare during ancient Byzantine times.

Baka – You're now in southern Jerusalem, but it looks like a village of its own. Mini-markets, bakeries and bookstores adorn Beit Lechem Road, from which most of Baka's streets branch out.

Next week, we'll explore the artistic solitude of Jerusalem's Yemin Moshe.

Hezbollah may hand over kidnap video

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Beirut newspaper A-Nahar reported Sunday that the militant Lebanese-based Hezbollah organization may hand over to Israel a videotape showing Colonel (res.) Elhanan Tannenbaum, who was kidnapped by Hezbollah in October 2000.

The paper reported progress in contacts between Israel and Hezbollah, and said the tape will show Israel that Tannenbaum is in good condition. In return for the tape, Israel will give Lebanon a map showing the location of landmines in southern Lebanon.

Tannenbaum, a reserve artillery officer and Tel Aviv businessman, flew from Israel to Brussels on Oct. 3, 2000. On Oct. 15, Hezbollah Secretary General Hassan Nasrallah announced in Beirut that his organization was holding a "Mossad officer," a claim Israel vigorously denied.

Israel has recently transferred several landmine maps to Lebanon, and according to the newspaper, this signifies a near breakthrough in relations with Hezbollah. Israel will agree to hand over the rest of the maps to Lebanon only in exchange for information on the three IDF soldiers, Benny Avraham, Omar Suad and Adi Avitan, who were kidnapped in October 2000. The paper added that a German mediator has had 17 meetings with senior Hezbollah officials.

Hezbollah is demanding that Israel release Lebanese prisoners held in Israel, including Abd al Karim Obeid and Mustafa Dirani, a request Israel has rejected. The organization also demands Israel release some 2,000 Palestinian detainees, 70 Syrian prisoners who are residents of the Golan Heights (probably Druze residents), five Iranian prisoners and four Jordanians.

The A-Nahar article is the latest in a number of signals from Lebanon regarding a possible prisoner exchange. Nasrallah said recently that Israel has agreed in principle to free Palestinian prisoners in a future deal, and an article printed last week in the Lebanese, Hezbollah-associated paper As-Safir claimed that Israel has agreed to release 150 prisoners in return for the release of the captured Israelis, a proposal rejected by Hezbollah.

Last week, Nasrallah met with Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, and it is possible that this unusual meeting dealt with promoting negotiations for a prisoner exchange. A-Nahar has reported that the two agreed that Hezbollah would end its activities in the disputed Shaaba Farms area, which lies at the junction of the Lebanese border and the Golan Heights in Israel.

Silver as good as it gets for two athletes in 2002

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Silver was as good as it got for two female Jewish athletes at the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City.

Russian skater Irina Slutskaya came second to teenage phenom Sarah Hughes in women's skating while goaltender Sara DaCosta backstopped the U.S. women's hockey team in a 3-2 loss to Canada, the gold medal winners.

DaCosta shone early and kept the Americans in the game as Canada mounted a strong first-period challenge. DaCosta stopped 26 of 29 shots and finished the tournament with a 2-1 record.

Slutskaya skated tentatively – some analysts said she played it too safe – after favoured American Michelle Kwan's disappointing performance, leaving the door open for Hughes to vault from fourth place after the short program to first overall.

American Sasha Cohen, who was third after the short program, finished out of the medals in fourth.

In ice dancing, the Israeli couple of Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovsky finished sixth while fellow Israelis Alexei Beletski and Natalia Gudina were 19th.

In short track speed skating, Olga Danilov of Israel competed in the 500-metre and 1,500-metre races, but could advance no farther than the quarter-finals in the 500-metres and the semi-finals in the 1,500-metres, finishing last in both heats.

American Dan Weinstein and his team came in fourth place in the 5,000-metre relay.

Israelis don't fear Iraqi attack

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Despite some recent sabre-rattling in Washington, Israel's gas mask distribution centres have not been overly busy.

In the past, Israelis would rush to the distribution centres whenever tensions between Washington and Baghdad escalated, fearing that Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein would attack Israel if the United States attacked Baghdad.

These days, however, Israelis seem quite calm – as if they know something that U.S. President George W. Bush does not.

The Israeli public's apparent indifference to the possibility of an Iraqi attack can be traced to three main reasons:

• Virtually every Israeli citizen, regardless of age, already has a gas mask at home;

• An American attack against Iraq is not perceived here as imminent; and

• When you already think twice before leaving home for fear of a Palestinian terror attack, you don't worry so much about Saddam.

In a recent poll conducted by the Israeli daily Ma'ariv, Iraq ranked third on the list of "gravest dangers."

Only nine per cent of the Israeli respondents cited Iraq as the gravest danger currently facing the nation, far less than the 30 per cent who cited the Palestinians and the 27 per cent who worried most about Iran.

The apparent apathy about Iraq comes amid frequent hints from Washington that Baghdad could be the next target in the U.S.-led campaign against terrorism. It also comes despite frequent warnings that Iraq is likely to attack Israel if Washington targets Iraq.

The U.S. ambassador to Israel, Daniel Kurtzer, issued just such a warning in a recent interview with Ma'ariv. Kurtzer refused to state whether the United States would demand that Israel refrain from joining a U.S.-led coalition against Iraq, as happened during the 1991 Gulf War.

At the time, Israel bowed to U.S. pressure and did not respond to a series of deadly Scud missile attacks that Iraq launched at Israel.

Kurtzer did say that if the United States attacks Iraq, or becomes involved "in any other anti-terror operations," then U.S. officials would make a point of consulting with their Israeli counterparts beforehand.

Like Kurtzer, Israeli military officials consider an Iraqi strike against Israel highly likely should the United States target Saddam's regime.

"Iraq will launch missiles against Israel only if Saddam Hussein feels that his life or his rule are threatened," Maj. Gen. Aharon Ze'evi-Farkash, the head of military intelligence, said last week.

However, considering that a U.S. attack on Iraq probably would aim to bring down Saddam's regime, there is much reason to expect an Iraqi attack on Israel, he said.

Just the same, officials such as Ze'evi-Farkash are optimistic that Israel can repel an Iraqi attack.

"Iraqi is capable of sending combat aircraft to bomb targets in Israel with conventional and nonconventional weapons," he said. "But we are confident that the air force can cope with that danger."

As part of its defences, Israel is relying on its Patriot anti-missile system. During Operation Desert Storm in January 1991, Patriot missile batteries were deployed in strategic positions across Israel.

The only defence against ground-to-ground missiles at the time, Patriots were launched at the 39 Scuds that Iraq fired on Israel in the course of the war. Many missed their targets, but the Patriot system has been upgraded considerably since then.

Last August, Israel successfully tested the latest version of another anti-missile system, the Arrow. In what was the ninth such test, the Arrow last week destroyed a simulated Scud over the Mediterranean Sea.

The Arrow missile system is part of a $2.2 billion (US) project known as Choma – Hebrew for "wall" – designed to counter missile attacks.

Israeli intelligence officials say Iraq has "several dozen" long-range missiles.

According to Ze'evi-Farkash, there is no information available about Iraq's capability for biological warfare. This may explain why Israeli authorities have refrained from immunizing the Israeli public against a possible anthrax attack, although Israel reportedly possesses sufficient stock of vaccines.

According to some critics of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, the Iraqi issue has affected his handling of the Palestinian intifadah.

Sharon said last week that he does not intend to bring down the Palestinian Authority, despite the deteriorating security situation. He made the comment last Tuesday in response to calls from members of his Likud Party to adopt a tougher stance toward the Palestinians.

"I don't intend to sit in Gaza," he said sharply to a Likud legislator who had called for a more aggressive Israeli response to the latest wave of Palestinian terror.

Sharon's critics are charging that diplomatic constraints are preventing him from ordering a broader military response.

Sharon is hamstrung by U.S. pressure, they say, because the United States is concerned that an escalation in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict could interfere with U.S. attempts to get Arab states into a broad anti-Saddam coalition.

As the political and diplomatic wrangling continues, some Israelis are confident that a military confrontation with Iraq is just a matter of time.

Nofar High-Tech, an Israeli firm, recently developed a portable shelter designed to provide protection against biological and chemical warfare.

The "safe room," which can be placed in any backyard, comes equipped with water and air filters. Each unit costs $40,000 (US).

HARRIS PAYS TRIBUTE AT DACHAU:
Ontario Premier Mike Harris stands in front of a memorial sculpture at the site of the Dachau concentration camp near Munich. Harris paid homage last week to Holocaust victims and survivors with a tour of the site, which is now a memorial. The premier, who was in Germany as part of the recent Team Canada trade mission, said the visit was meant "to honour the victims, who suffered so greatly, and the survivors who came to our province."

Panel rejects reservists' sedition

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee last week unanimously approved a motion condemning the refusal of Israel Defence Forces reservists to serve in the West Bank and Gaza. The committee also called on any officers or reservists thinking of joining the refuseniks to reconsider the matter.

The committee's decision states that serving in the IDF and carrying out the difficult tasks the army is forced to execute, as part of the defence of Israel and its citizens, is a duty, as well as a democratic, moral and legal value. According to the committee, these are preconditions of Israel's existence as a democratic and peace-loving nation.

The chairman of the committee, MK David Magen (Center Party), said that refusing to serve could have a severely negative affect on the national morale, adding that Israel must not hand the Palestinians any moral victories in a war the country has been coerced into.

According to Magen, the Palestinians would recognize divisions in the nation's collective morale, and this recognition would, in turn, increase their attacks against Israel.

Only three members of the Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee participated in last week's meeting, with MKs Ran Cohen (Meretz) and Colette Avital (Labor) both backing the motion.

But opposition leader MK Yossi Sarid (Meretz) came out against the motion, saying that while his party rejected the phenomenon, the committee had no right passing motions on a subject that was purely a matter for each individual soldier's conscience.

Collection of Jewish short stories offers many surprises and delights

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

A new collection of 17 short stories by Canadian Jewish writers, published by the Red Deer Press of Calgary, demonstrates both the diversity and literary acumen that we have come to expect from our writing community, past and present.

Not Quite Mainstream: Canadian Jewish Short Stories is edited by Norman Ravvin, the gifted short-story writer who is presently chair of Canadian Jewish Studies at Concordia University in Montreal.

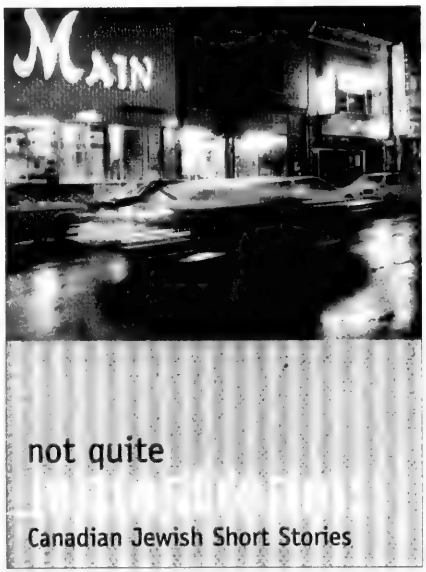
Ravvin has assembled a rich historical cross-section that offers many surprises and delights.

Since it's both desirable and compulsory to include our most celebrated scribe in such a project, the editor has made the obvious choice in presenting The Street, Mordecai Richler's wry and ribald comic sketch of life in Montreal's Jewish ghetto. (For whatever reason, perhaps because it was too ribald or too ripe with shtick, The Street was omitted from Canadian Jewish Short Stories, the notable collection that Miriam Waddington edited for Oxford University Press a dozen years ago.)

The contents page of Not Quite Mainstream lists several stories by familiar authors that I had long been meaning to read: Norman Levine's Thin Ice, for example, a comic treat that bears comparison to I. B. Singer's The Briefcase. Another was Matt Cohen's Lives of the Mind Slaves, which is hip, poetic, agile and – surprise, surprise – Jewish to its very core.

Irving Layton's Piety and Cary Fagan's Nora By the Sea are also logical and welcome contributions by well-established writers. (A.M. Klein was omitted because his stories fall "below the quality of his other work," the editor explains; other no-shows include Leonard Cohen and Adele Wiseman, neither of whom focused on the short story.)

Commendably, Not Quite Mainstream seemingly rescues some gems from obscurity, for instance That First Morning, translated from the original Yiddish of Yaacov Zipper. This highly deserving piece opens the collection and presents a fresh tableau of a European immigrant's first moments in Canada. I read it as if discovering pages from a diary that might have belonged to my own grandfather.



Numerous pieces by Chava Rosenfarb, Rochl Korn, Elaine Kalman Naves and others reflect the inescapable monolith of the Holocaust. Some are set entirely in Europe and the past. Those set at least partly in Canada are obviously better at fulfilling our expectation that they provide some insight into our experience in Canada.

Stories involving the eternal theme of persecution, although not Holocaust-related, include Tom Wayman's The Murder, a riveting piece about an old-world murder with new-world consequences; and Robyn Sarah's A Minor Incident, in which a girl's rising awareness of the possibility of anti-Semitism seems to precipitate her fall from childhood innocence.

Jews, these stories show, cannot help but be Jewish. That is why, despite record levels of cultural assimilation, we remain Not Quite Mainstream.

Ravvin observes, as Waddington did before him, that short stories by Canadian Jews defy categorization. He suggests they are best characterized by "the variety, the unpredictability, and the ongoing transformation" inherent in them.

This collection demonstrates the truth of this: it is a garden strewn with diverse flowering plants, including many exotics.

Consider Fuller Brush by Kenneth Sherman, which leaves us wanting more stories from this prolific poet. Or August, by Claire Rothman – a unique and sensational tale that made me wonder why I had never heard of either Rothman or this story before now.

Ravvin's contribution, A Story with Sex, Skyscrapers, and Standard Yiddish, is equally a tour-de-force as it humourously presents the writer's existential landscape – a man, a plan, a mirror, a window, a girl, an apartment, a typewriter – in language that easily dazzles.

Not Quite Mainstream deserves a wide readership. It is available in softcover in bookstores for $18.95.

Travel Talk

FROM CAESAREA TO AKKO: TOURING ISRAEL'S NORTHERN COAST

"The Romans arrived here in 63 BCE," says our guide, Mike Rogoff. "They came for the weekend and stayed 400 years."

He stops the minivan beside Caesarea's famed aqueduct, which runs elegantly, arch after arch, along a stretch of Mediterranean seacoast south of Haifa. Meticulously engineered to carry fresh water from Mount Carmel some six kilometres away, the aqueduct is the town's most recognizable emblem. It seems to end here abruptly, Rogoff explains, because the encroaching bay forced a section to collapse.

The famed aqueduct in Caesarea is the town's most recognizable item. [IGTO photo]

Transforming a Phoenician fishing village into this major Roman port city was a pet project of Herod the Great, the ancient king who named the place in honour of Emperor Augustus Caesar. For centuries Caesarea prospered as a vital nexus in the lucrative spice trade between Europe and the Far East. It was a thriving metropolis whose population, according to some historians, was between 50,000 and 60,000; others put the figure as high as 100,000.

Local Roman remains also include a spectacular theatre that has been renovated and holds thousands for concerts and operas each summer. Remnants of palaces, markets, wide roads, baths, mosaics, temples and luxurious public buildings have also been unearthed.

The tradition of luxurious living still continues in the area, expressed in many fine modern homes and hotels, and Israel's only 18-hole golf course.

Next, our guide shows us the port area, which has been the focus of intense underwater excavations. Many scholars had doubted the historical accounts of Herod's huge port, which had sunk several metres beneath the waves, until this ancient facility was rediscovered in the 1960s.

Like much in Israel, Caesarea is overlaid by many millennia of history. To the Byzantine Christians it was a centre of learning; its former 30,000-volume library was considered one of the best in the world. In the 12th century, the Crusaders fortified the town with massive walls, portions of which still stand, accompanied by moats, balustrades and towers.

Local Jewish history? Tragically, Caesarea's Jewish minority was butchered in the time of the First Jewish Revolt (66 CE). According to the Roman Jewish historian Josephus: "The people of Caesarea had massacred the Jewish colony, in less than an hour, slaughtering more than 20,000 and emptying Caesarea of the last Jew."

The collapse of Jerusalem in 70 CE was celebrated by special games here, in which some 2,500 Jews were torn apart by wild beasts, Josephus reports.

Our guide, usually a walking encyclopedia, only hints at these horrors, and doesn't say a word about Herod's penchant for slaughtering Jewish sages and members of the Sanhedrin.

"The Roman emperor made Herod the king of the Jews, but the Jews hated him," he says. "He may have influenced people, but he certainly didn't win any friends." That's as close as he comes to these dark unmentionables of history.

We're on the road again, riding along an old highway that takes us through Or Akiva, then Zichron Yaakov, named for the father of the village's patron, Baron Edmund de Rothschild. This is an important wine-growing region. It is also, as Rogoff points out, "the northern limit of the orange groves. You'll still find them for another few miles, and that's it."

Bypassing Haifa, we enter the Jezreel Valley, scene of biblical battles involving Deborah, Gideon, Saul, Ahab and others. We pass over the Kishon, a brook that recent rain has swollen into a river, and we cross the Zebulon Valley. The terrain likewise seems swollen with midrashic tales, haggadic stories, historic legends and modern lore.

We reach Akko (Acre), the last bastion of the Crusaders in the Holy Land, whose inner city is a spectacular labyrinth of subterranean Crusader remains built by the Templars, Teutonic Knights and Hospitaliers of medieval times.

It's almost too much to believe that all these extraordinary things we're seeing can exist side by side in one land.

We tour the massive Crusader halls and the new visitor centre, then sit down for lunch in a local restaurant. As we order our meal, we're still discussing various aspects of local history, from the Crusades to Napoleon's more recent incursions two centuries ago.

"The perennial problem of the Crusaders was the problem of manpower," Rogoff comments. "They emptied the jails of Europe to go on the Crusades. People's motivation was not always one of high spirituality. Some people were merely trying to get away from bad family situations."

Akko is enormously impressive; so it's not surprising that UNESCO recently designated it as one of 690 "world heritage" sites. Other designated sites include Stonehenge, the Taj Mahal, the Pyramids, the Great Wall of China, and in Israel, Jerusalem and Masada.

Within minutes the waiter brings us an array of delicious Middle Eastern specialties: hummus, tabouli, techinah, falafel balls, finely chopped salad, pita bread and "nana" or fresh mint tea. We dig in heartily. Only in Israel, it seems, can visitors enjoy such an enriching smorgasbord of history, culture and cuisine

Documentary on survivors of Mengele's experiments

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Josef Mengele, the so-called Angel of Death, performed gruesome medical experiments in Auschwitz in the hallowed name of science.

Virtually all his subjects were Jewish twins.

He regarded these experiments as an unsurpassed opportunity to further his knowledge of eugenics and genetics.

Leo Lowy and his sister, Miriam, were two such twins. From their home in Beregove, Hungary, they were deported to Auschwitz in 1944.

Leo's Journey: The Story of the Mengele Twins is billed as the ordeal of a man who survived the war in spite of Mengele.

In fact, this documentary, which will be broadcast by Vision TV on Wednesday, March 6 at 10 p.m. and again on Tuesday, March 12 at 1 a.m., is the story of several survivors.

Shortly after it starts, Lowy, now a resident of Vancouver, is seen packing his bags. He plans to return to Beregove, whose Jewish population was decimated by the Nazis, and from there to Auschwitz, where he was incarcerated.

He will be accompanied by his two grown sons, Richard and Gary.

Once in Beregove, now part of Ukraine, Lowy visits his childhood home as well as the local synagogue.

Thanks to their presence, a minyan is raised. Only four out of 8,000 Jews went back to the town after the Holocaust.

Strangely enough, Lowy all but avoids the topic at hand – Mengele's experiments. And his sister remains a cipher.

Indeed, we're left to wonder whether he and Miriam were subjected to Mengele's special treatment.

In point of fact, first-hand accounts are provided by Miriam and Yona Laks and Eva and Miriam Moses, twins about whom precious little is revealed.

Leo's Journey, which is narrated by Christopher Plummer, discloses that some 3,000 twins were made available to Mengele, a member of the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute in Berlin. There were only 250 survivors.

Mengele, we're told, had a proprietary interest in twins. He kept them in segregated barracks and out of harm's way until he was ready to deal with them.

The twins lived in constant fear of being "selected" by Mengele, who left Auschwitz in November 1944 after the last transport pulled into the camp.

Mengele's experiments were utterly demeaning: the twins he examined were mere objects.

"Every part of my body was measured, every movement noted," recalls one of the women whose testimony condemns Mengele as a wanton killer.

Leo's Journey, which is almost one hour in length, is supplemented by erudite comments from, among others, American and German historians Christopher Browning and Benno Muller-Hill.

They impart important background information about the Holocaust and Nazi Germany's euthanasia program, which had its deadly roots in the pseudo science of eugenics.

Play inspired by Baranovski case

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Misha, a one-act play about the schoolyard murder in Toronto of a young Jew by another young Jew, is part of the Buncha Young Artists Festival at Theatre Passe Muraille Backspace.

Running for approximately 50 minutes, the play will be performed along with A Martian Summer from March 6 to 23, as part of the festival of works by young playwrights organized by Theatre Direct Canada.

Although he was "inspired" by the Matti Baranovski murder, "which saddened and depressed me," playwright Adam Pettle said Misha is not about that case.

But there are parallels between the two stories. Baranovski, who was 15 years old, was kicked to death in G. Ross Lord Park by three young men in December 1999. Misha, 16, a Canadian immigrant from Israel (played by Daniel Stemer), is murdered by Aaron (Jacob Barker), a 19-year-old former Israeli soldier, over a pack of cigarettes, as was the case with Baranovski.

In the play, Max, 16, (Miklos Perlus), a Canadian and Misha's close friend, runs away from the scene and is plagued by guilt. He thinks about suicide, but ultimately puts that thought aside and survives.

"A central concept of Judaism is that we care about one another, and that explains Max's great grief," said Perlus, 24, who plays Max, adding that he thinks the play will have a real message for young people about the futility of violence.

A former student at Leo Baeck day school and York Mills Collegiate, Perlus is a graduate of McGill University, and has been acting since he was 10.

Director Richard Greenblatt said Misha delivers an important lesson for the whole community, showing how arguments over small things can escalate into tragic events.

Adam Pettle

"It could happen just as easily to non-Jews," he said. "There is nothing that makes it a Jewish event."

An experienced actor, Greenblatt is playing producer Sam Goldwyn in Adam Baum, the Jew Movie, at Canadian Stage, beginning March 11.

"Lately, about half the work I do has a Jewish theme," Greenblatt said. That includes Sibs and the Passover-based Theory of Relatives, in both of which he had leading parts.

Two other festival productions, Roundabout and The Phoenix Rides a Skateboard, run in repertory with Misha and A Martian Summer during the same period.

For tickets, call the Theatre Passe Muraille box office at 416 504-7529. Theatre Direct Canada offers Monday to Friday matinees and provides students with a post-show meeting with the actors.

TRANSLATION WITH A TWIST: BOOK STARTS IN ENGLISH AND TURNS TO YIDDISH

Martin Green has just published a new translation of On Foreign Soil, a Yiddish novel by Falik Zolf, with a twist – this version starts in English and gradually turns to Yiddish while you read. He reads from his innovative translation this weekend in Toronto.

Originally published in 1945, Zolf's novel is a Yiddish classic, Green says. He describes it as "a heart-warming coming-of-age story set in Imperial Russia." The story begins at the outbreak of World War I, when the protagonist, a 16-year-old yeshiva bocher (rabbinical student) is thrust into the bubbling cauldron of 20th-century politics: war, revolution, nationalism, Zionism and the rise of modern anti-Semitism.

Green's two-volume translation begins by introducing isolated words in Yiddish, then eventually offers phrases and whole sentences. By the end of the first volume, the book is half Yiddish. The second volume starts in English again, but progresses rapidly into thicker Yiddish. The last chapter is entirely in Yiddish.

The publication provides copious footnotes on vocabulary, grammatical and cultural issues, and detailed summaries of each chapter in English. The translator insists it is fully accessible to readers with no previous knowledge of Yiddish. For the faint of heart, an all-English "cheaters' edition" is available at the Web site, www.onforeignsoil.com.

"If you had to choose just one book that best deals with the Jewish experience in the 20th century, then you should probably read Exodus by Leon Uris," Green comments. "But my book would definitely be a close second."

He reads at Israel's Judaica Centre, 897 Eglinton Ave. W., Sunday, March 3, 7:30 p.m. Admission free; refreshments provided. The evening begins with a musical reception.

A Prizewinner's New Play: From director Daniel Brooks comes The Good Life, a provocative new play that explores the essence of love. This is Brooks's first solo effort as a playwright; he previously co-authored Insomnia, The Noam Chomsky Lectures and The Theory of Relatives. Last October, he was awarded the first Siminovitch prize in Theatre, and a press release describes him as "one of Canada's boldest and most influential directors."

Diabetes needs life-long commitment to management

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Once contracting diabetes, patients must undergo a life-long battle of management, says Dr. Nina Wine, a local endocrinologist and diabetes consultant.

"Patients need to become masters of their own health and become involved in their disease," she said at the recent Toronto Hadassah-WIZO Women for Women Breakfast.

The breakfast is part of the organization's Women for Women campaign to raise money for services that improve the lives of women and children in Israel and Toronto. Projects in Israel include youth villages and schools, legal advice bureaus, shelters for battered women and a rape crisis centre.

In Toronto, Women for Women helps support ASTEH-Alternative Short Term Emergency Housing; the North York Women's Shelter; Yellow Brick House, which provides transitional housing, legal support and referral services; and Microskills, an organization that helps clients achieve economic self-sufficiency.

The good news about diabetes, Wine said, is that we know more about it today than ever before. "When treated properly, we can help prevent the complications that are inevitable if the disease goes untreated. We also know a lot about prevention. Lifestyle change, diet and exercise are the cornerstones in preventing the illness before it manifests into a disease."

On the down side, however, Wine said that although statistics cite that one in 20 Canadians are diabetic, those figures are likely underestimated. "For each person diagnosed, there might be someone who is undiagnosed. Mortality rates from the disease are still rising."

Of the three types of diabetes – type one, type two and gestational diabetes – 90 per cent of patients have type two, said Wine.

In type one diabetes , the pancreas does not produce the insulin necessary to ensure body energy, and unused sugar remains in the blood or is passed through the urine.

In type two, the body does not produce enough insulin or does not effectively use the insulin it produces.

"This type typically occurs in adults, but with the current epidemic of obesity, we are seeing more and more type two diabetes in adolescents."

Gestational diabetes occurs in about two to four per cent of pregnant women, she said. Of those women, about 40 per cent will develop the disease within five to 10 years, she said.

Those at greatest risk for developing diabetes, she said, are adults over age 45 who are obese as measured by a body mass index. Certain ethnic groups and those who have a family history of the disease are also at risk, said Wine.

Symptoms of the disease include excessive urination, unexpected weight loss, blurred vision, recurrent infection or numbness in the feet or lower extremities.

"There is no such thing as having a little sugar problem. Either you have diabetes or you don't," said Wine.

Before people develop type two diabetes, she said, there tends to be a period when the level of insulin in the body rises because the pancreas is starting to become overworked. "After some years of this, the production of insulin falls and the sugar level rises.

"Associated with this state are such conditions as high blood pressure and a predisposition to stroke and heart disease.

"Diabetes is leading cause in North America of blindness, kidney failure and below-the- knee amputation," she said.

Treatment for diabetes is by a step by step approach, said Wine. "Always start with diet and exercise. Thirty minutes of exercise, four times a week, helps lower blood sugar.

"There are five classes of medication, and as one fails another type can be used, but these medications are always reinforced by diet and exercise."

Patients must become educated about their disease, she said. "They must learn about it and they must learn to live with it. It is not going away."

Survey finds U.S. Jews identifying themselves by culture

By PABLO FUCHS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jews are increasingly identifying themselves with their culture instead of their religion, a survey has found.

The results of the American Jewish Identity Survey 2001 revealed that the number of American Jews identifying themselves as Jewish by religion has gone down, while those identifying themselves as Jewish but not religious, has dramatically increased.

Presented recently by Secular Humanistic Jewish spiritual leader Eva Goldfinger, the findings are based on questions analyzing Jews' connections to their religion, people, institutions, values, and culture.

Although the survey has helped to show how Jews feel about their religion, it still has a lot of faults, Goldfinger said.

"The weakness of this study is that we really don't know how the people identify themselves," she explained.

"Plus, Jews can be so different, that when measuring something like Jewishness, we're measuring our own idiosyncrasies."

But at the same time, the survey does serve an important purpose: it helps figure out how American Jews are living and where the Jewish people in the United States are heading.

According to the survey, the rate of intermarriage is at 52 per cent. Of those people, only one-third are raising their children Jewish. The result is that the number of households that identify themselves as Jewish by religion has decreased dramatically while the number of households where there is at least one Jew has increased.

Intermarriage is a big issue in North America, and it should be because "on one side, people teach liberalism and respect and love for others while on the other hand, they're saying don't intermarry," she said.

"In the end, people are forced to choose between one set of values and another that's totally different."

However, people shouldn't become too hung up on intermarriage because the more pressing issue is that of Jews who no longer attend synagogue because it doesn't meet their needs, and in the process lose part of their culture, Goldfinger said.

"So much focus has been placed on intermarriage that secularization is being ignored," she noted. "So much money has been put into intermarriage outreach programs that secular Jews are being left with no voice."

So what exactly should be done? "Jews are saying they don't want to become more religious," she said. "And we have to listen."

The first thing that has to be done, according to Goldfinger, is to educate adults about Jewish culture, which she says, can be "fascinating" if one learns the right things.

In five years time, Goldfinger plans to do this on a more consistent basis with opening a centre for Humanistic Judaism in Toronto where Jews can go and learn at an intellectual level all aspects of Jewish life.

But that's not all, she said. Jews have to become more open minded and accept their differences. Since society is fluid, Judaism, too, must become more fluid and accepting of more than one way to live a Jewish life, or Jewish continuance will suffer a diminishing blow, Goldfinger explained.

"When we ask ourselves, 'Will there be Jews in the year 2100?' I must say that there will definitely be Jewish people, but it all depends on how you define Jewish."

Haggadot available for the blind

For over 70 years, the Jewish Braille Institute Library in New York City has enabled visually impaired and blind people all over the world to participate in the most treasured of Jewish rituals, the Passover seder, by providing large print or Braille Haggadot free of charge.

Panel ponders pleasure in Jewish thought

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Can one conscientiously follow the Torah and still enjoy a soccer game, an exquisite piece of pottery or a Shakespeare play?

This conundrum was the basis of a recent Saturday evening panel discussion sponsored by Nishma, an organization that promotes Jewish adult education. It was part of a program series on the theme Religiously Incorrect.

Moderator Rabbi Benjamin Hecht, Nishma executive director, explained that, theoretically, the Torah ideal is to either study or make money so that others can study.

Nothing is said about someone with artistic aspirations, such as a painter, Rabbi Hecht said.

A further question is: if one does "follow the muse, is the only valuable expression religious art, music or writing?" he asked. "Is there any value in culture or in gaining secular knowledge?"

Artist Chashi Skobac suggested that since God created the world, "everything in it is a manifestation of His work."

For instance, she said, sports are "an expression of the beauty of life," and one should appreciate the "teamwork, beauty and aesthetics involved, which reflects a higher beauty even if no one is aware of it."

Paul Appleby, a graphic artist and photographer, said the purpose of the mitzvot is "to civilize us, not to stifle us." Noting that even "great scholars go to the beach, and Rabbi Akiva [a major scholar of the first century CE] went to the steam bath," he said the Torah does not condemn the notion of pleasure.

However, he said, pleasure must be controlled and the issue is whether pleasure enhances one's life or degrades it.

Rabbi Hecht noted the Torah does not denigrate secular experience. "There are blessings for both the religious and the secular scholar."

Dvorah Hoffman, a potter as well as a teacher of children with learning disabilities, told the story of a yeshiva student who hid under the bed when his rosh yeshiva was having sex with his wife. When caught by the indignant rabbi, the student said that just as he learned other aspects of Torah from him, so too he wanted to learn about sex.

The point of the story, Hoffman said, is that while there is holiness in everything, including arts, sports and sex, one must be conscious of not bringing the Torah into disrepute, as did the student, while engaging in secular pursuits.

Gittel Rosensweig-Weinberger, formerly a rebbitzen in Kitchener, said that she considers enjoying sports "part of my love of Yiddishkeit."

God made all the wonderful things in the world for non-Jews and Jews alike, she said, and loving sports such as swimming, mountain climbing and snorkeling, all of which she takes part in, is a way to appreciate His goodness.

It is all a question of balancing religious obligations with an enjoyment of the secular world, Rabbi Hecht said.

Audience members distinguished between pleasures of the body, such as eating or having a massage, and pleasures of the soul, such as music – or even acid rock as opposed to Vivaldi – as well as between pleasures in which one is a participant or a spectator.

Rabbi Hecht said the question of the place of the secular world in Jewish thought does not have an absolute answer, but is a matter for ongoing questioning and debate.

Adventure travelers visit exotic locations

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is a time in one's life, before the kids arrive or a career grabs all your attention, when a person can be footloose and free to travel the world.

Exotic destinations beckon, and instead of a week on a beach, each location can be given as much time as is needed to really get to know the place.

Brian Levy, 33, knows all about spending lots of time savouring the mysteries of distant lands. Several years ago, he put a law practice on the shelf, hoisted his rucksack on his back, and headed to Japan, where he spent three years living and working.

"It was different. It was interesting, being both special and nice to experience a different culture and not take anything for granted," he said.

To support himself, Levy taught English and some business courses at Kokusai University. He also did "dub-over work" for Japanese television.

And he didn't let his Far Eastern base go to waste. With the rest of Asia at his doorstep, Levy spent seven or eight months of his three years visiting mainland Asia and venturing as far as Australia.

Levy is back in Toronto now, working as a teacher at Centennial College, lecturing young people in law and business. But, he admits, "I never got the love of travel and adventure out of my system."

He and his wife, Rachel, who shared his Far Eastern experience, believe there are plenty of others who are game to try something different, to take a road less travelled. For the last two years, they have run The Undiscovered World, a mom-and-pop sized company that takes small groups of young adults to Australia for 30 days of unique – and physically demanding – vacationing.

Aimed at 18-25 year-olds, their product is geared for those who are looking for an active, get-out-of-the-bus vacation, and who aren't expecting a Hilton hotel every night.

Jungle treks, kayaking, camping (if you're lucky, kangaroos might visit your campsite), sleeping in hammocks on tropical islands, off-road touring in sport utility vehicles, swimming in waterfall channels – that's what the Undiscovered World has in store for participants, Levy said.

The program also offers a five-day scuba certification course, crocodile "hunting," (with a camera, not a gun), a visit to Uluru (also known as Ayer's Rock, which at two miles wide is the world's largest monolith), and even a visit to Sydney to experience its trendy beach life.

An optional side trip to Japan, is also available at the end of the trip.

Working with contacts in Australia, who book the local events, Levy said they have put together an itinerary that challenges participants and rewards them like no other foreign vacation.

"People see it as a more satisfying way to travel," he said. "At the end of the day, you sit around a fire, cook up a steak and enjoy a beer. You feel you've accomplished something."

Recognizing that 30 days is out of reach for most working people, Levy is considering adding a shortened trip for an older age cohort of 30- to 50-year-olds.

One thing he guarantees, however: Whatever its duration, he will take travellers to undiscovered areas where they will trek that less travelled road.

Bridge with Gitelman

Early this month a miracle took place. The unheralded Canadian Bridge Team (of which I was a member) shocked the world by winning the Gold Medal at the IOC Grand Prix tournament in Salt Lake City. This event was held just before the Winter Olympic Games and was intended to show the members of the International Olympic Committee that bridge is a sport that is worthy of inclusion in the Olympics. Ten Nations were invited to this event and Canada, to put it charitably, was not exactly one of the betting favorites.

When Canada faced the heavily favoured American team in the first match of the round robin phase of this event, there was electricity in the air. There were plenty of spectators and reporters on hand, confident that the Americans would use this easy first round encounter as a springboard to the gold medal. It was not to be. Early in the match I found myself on play in a vulnerable grand slam that turned out to be the pivotal deal of this match. My partner was Joey Silver from Montreal and my opponents were David Berkowitz and Larry Cohen, one of the most successful partnerships in the world during the last 10 years or so.

Joey	Fred
♠ AQJ	♠ 98
♥ 86	♥ AKQ97
♦ 93	♦ AKQ65
♣ AKJ1042	♣ Q

This is how the bidding went:

Fred	Joey
2♣	3♣
3♥	4♣
4♦	4♠
5NT	7NT

Joey and I did not know exactly what we were doing, but we did manage to get to the best correct contract (although 7NT would have been even better if we had been able to make Joey the declarer). The opening lead was a spade. Think about how you would play as declarer before reading on.

My first decision was easy. I won the ♠A, refusing the finesse. I knew I would be able to win all 13 tricks unless suits broke very badly and the spade finesse seemed like a needless risk. My next move was to test the hearts and diamonds. Hearts divided 4-2, but the diamonds were 3-3 so 13 tricks were easy (the ♠A, three heart tricks, five diamond tricks, and four club tricks).

Notice the problem that I would have created for myself if I had played on clubs before the red suits. It turned out that Larry, on my right, had been dealt five clubs headed by the 9 – good enough to stop the suit given the blockage that existed and the lack of an outside dummy entry.

If I had played clubs from the top at trick two I would have had to guess whether to discard from hearts or from diamonds. If I had guessed wrong I would have gone down in my grand slam. It seemed somewhat just that the correct line of playing the red suits before clubs was rewarded on the actual lie of the cards!

When the Americans at the other table held our cards they played in 7♣ instead of 7NT and my hand ended up as declarer (after an strong artificial 2♣ opening bid). Nick Gartaganis, West for Canada, also led a spade. The American declarer correctly chose to win the ♠A and play clubs from the top. He thus failed in his contract when clubs split 5-1. Canada won 20 IMPs (International Match Points) on this deal and went on to easily defeat the powerful American Team.

Perhaps this was a sign of big things to come for Team Canada. I will continue my coverage of Canada's performance of the 2002 IOC Grand Prix next month.

Fred Gitelman is one of Canada's most successful tournament bridge players. His Toronto-based company, Bridge Base Inc, is a world leader in the development of educational software for bridge. You can find out more about Fred and his company through www.bridgebase.com. Fred's columns will appear once a month in The Canadian Jewish News. Questions and comments from readers are welcome, but we cannot guarantee a personal response.

'We are all Jews'

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Ask someone outside of the Jewish pale to define the Toronto Jewish community. Many responses will include the belief that our community is very tight knit and supportive of our own.

But is that correct? Are we indeed a unified community – as together as we appear?

In some ways. One only has to look at the community's response during Operation Exodus. At that time, the majority of Jews, from all denominations, contributed to that UJA campaign to rescue Soviet Jews. Operations Moses, Solomon (rescues of Ethiopian Jews) and the current campaign to help the Jews of Argentina, are other examples of a unified Jewish community working together to rescue our brothers and sisters in need.

Generally, issues dealing with pidyon shvuyim (rescuing a prisoner) or security at home and/or in Israel, encourage fraternization between denominations. Threats from without seem to lower the walls of differences which normally keep us apart. This is likely because of the cross-denominational acceptance of the Jewish value that saving a life stands above all else.

Are we tight-knit, however, from within?

Once a colleague told me that she had never actually talked to a haredi Jew. She said, "I see them walking to shul on Shabbat, with an enthusiastic gait, but I couldn't tell you where they're going or what the significance is of their dress."

Through my own experiences as an Orthodox Jew and my years in yeshiva, I would often hear comments about other denominations fraught with misunderstanding, such as the belief that Conservative and Reform Jews have little understanding of Judaism and a marginal commitment to its continuity.

It is likely that the various denominations within Judaism will never rub religious elbows in the forum of Jewish law, as the schism separating them is as wide as the Grand Canyon, particularly in areas such as "Who is a Jew." (It is worth mentioning that the Israeli government is currently struggling to make the process of conversion the responsibility of all denominations).

It is imperative, however, that all Toronto Jews begin to strengthen their ranks from within by breaking down many of the stereotypes and suspicions found on both sides of the divide.

We need to meet. We need to talk. We need to learn Torah together.

If we do this, Orthodox Jews might catch a glimpse of the magnificent deeds – mitzvot – accomplished by a plethora of Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist Jews, and the vast investment they have made in tikkun olam – repairing our world.

Reform, Conservative and other Jews might uncover the fierce passion for Torah study found in Orthodox shuls, yeshivot and nightly shiurim (classes). They might also unearth the sophisticated network of care and compassion that is revealed through committees, shul groups and social services in places like the Agudah, Bobov, Sha'arei Shomayim and B'nai Torah.

From a pragmatic point of view, greater harmony within our neighbourhood will serve to buttress a stronger defence in times of peril. From a biblical standpoint, it is urgent that such intercourse takes place so that we are in sync with the Jewish imperative to love your neighbour.

At a time when Israel and Jews are taking some unyielding body checks from without, it's crucial that we get to know one another and ultimately toughen ourselves from within. To achieve this, we must first recognize we are all Jews, that we are all here to stay and that a glaring blackout of understanding between our denominations is fodder for our enemies, peculiar to our friends and anathema to our teachings as Jews.

Next time you pass a Jew of another denomination on Shabbat, say Shabbat Shalom. After all, we are all Jews. Our enemies know that. It is time we did as well.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I've heard of this happening to other mothers, but now it's happened to me.

When I was cleaning out my 13-year-old daughter's room, I came across her diary. It is not locked and I was dying to read it. I didn't. I put it right back where I found it and can't get it out of my mind.

She has changed dramatically the last year. She has been getting phone calls from boys, she wears some make-up, her grades have slipped slightly and we fight all the time over curfews and friends.

I'd love to know what's going on in her head right now, but she won't share any information that gives me the answers I am looking for.

Do you think I should sneak a peak into that book? I know it holds all the answers.

Sneak a Peak

Dear Sneak a Peak

Good for you. I'm proud of you for putting that diary back where it was without opening it. I know it must have taken much will power.

You daughter is entitled to her privacy. At 13, her hormones are raging and her life as a child is beginning to evolve into the next stage – a teenager. Buckle up for the ride of your life.

She doesn't sound as if she is doing anything out of the ordinary for a girl her age. Unless her life is in danger, I wouldn't try to find out about her life deceptively.

If you want to know what's going on in her life, talk to her. Maybe not head on at the kitchen table, but sort of casually, like when you are driving her somewhere. Try to stay involved and know what her extra-curricular activities are in school. Make sure she stays busy with healthy things like a sports club or a Jewish organization for teens.

It's a tough time for parents. Teens are pushing their limits to learn how far they can go. You want to trust them and let go a little, but you need to stay involved. Now more than ever.

If you keep the lines of communication open between you, the need to read her diary will not be an issue.

Canada abstains

Israel and U.S. vote no

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada has abstained on an important United Nations vote that begins the implementation of resolutions passed at last September's tumultuous World Conference Against Racism (WCAR) in Durban, South Africa.

The conference was widely denounced by Western nations as an exercise in Israel-bashing, anti-Zionist vitriol and overt anti-Semitism. The United States and Israel left the gathering midway. Despite pressure to boycott or quit the WCAR, Canada stayed until the end and issued a pointed "statement of reservation," saying it wished to disassociate itself from those sections of the final declaration dealing with the Middle East, and adding it was inappropriate of the conference to have focused so much attention on Israel and the Palestinians.

Canada also lamented that the conference attempted to delegitimize Israel and "dishonour the history and suffering of the Jewish people."

But last week, the United Nation's General Assembly overwhelmingly passed the resolution, termed a "comprehensive implementation of, and follow-up to, the World Conference Against Racism,

Arens skeptical of Saudi plan

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Moshe Arens, Israel's former foreign minister, gave Saudi Arabia's new peace proposal a cool reception last week.

"I don't see much coming out of it, and I can't take it seriously," he said in an interview.

The Saudi plan, yet to be formally presented, broadly calls for an Israeli withdrawal back to its pre-1967 lines in exchange for the recognition of Israel and normalization of relations with the Arab world.

Arens, a Likud member of the Knesset, said he is skeptical about the plan because Saudi Arabia – which he called an "autocratic regime" – did not contact Israel directly to gauge its reaction.

Moshe Arens [Big Dipper photo]

"Israel has never been approached," said Arens, who was here under the auspices of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Israel Now and Forever.

The Saudi plan, in fact, was outlined by Crown Prince Abdullah – the de facto ruler of Saudi Arabia – to New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman several weeks ago.

In any case, Arens said, Israel should not agree to relinquish the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights as a precondition for talks and normalized relations with the Arabs. And he had another qualm. "Who Saudi Arabia is representing is hard to say. Iraq? Syria?"

The News in Brief

CANADA

Letters to Hindus

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress has sent a letter to a Hindu temple that was vandalized last month. Ontario region chair Ed Morgan said CJC was "deeply shocked" to learn of the attack on the Gayatri Mandir, in which six Hindu deities were desecrated. "The desecration of a holy temple is a despicable act of hatred and cowardice. Our thoughts are with you during this difficult hour," stated CJC's letter to the temple's spiritual leader, Pandit Ganesh Persaud. In a statement headed "Jewish Canada Responds," B'nai Brith Canada noted that it also sent a letter to the temple, in which it condemned the attack.

Jail for Vandal

EDMONTON — A local man who firebombed a synagogue was sentenced last week to one year in jail. Yousef Sandouga, 21, pleaded guilty last year to one count of arson for throwing a Molotov cocktail through a window of Beth Shalom Synagogue the night of Oct. 31, 2000. Sandouga severely burned his hands when he tried to light a second fire.

ISRAEL

New Fund

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency for Israel has created a fund for victims of terror in Israel, established in partnership with Diaspora communities. The fund will assist Israeli citizens, especially new immigrants, who fall victim to terror. Also last month, the Jewish Agency approved a $140 million (US) budget to help Argentine Jews who immigrate to Israel.

Clinton Blames Arafat

JERUSALEM — U.S. Senator Hillary Clinton, on a solidarity visit to Israel, blamed Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat for failing to stop violence. Speaking in Jerusalem last week, Clinton declared that Arafat "has failed as a leader, and his inability or unwillingness to rein in forces of violence and terrorism demonstrates he is not ready or willing to be a leader."

El Al Head Quits

JERUSALEM — The president of El Al airlines has resigned. After 15 months on the job, David Hermesh quit Feb. 20, citing "substantial professional differences" with the airline's chairman, Michael Levy. Among the points of dispute between the two was a strategy for rehabilitating the airline, which has suffered substantial losses because of sagging tourism in Israel.

WORLD

Victims Memorialized

NEW YORK — A group of Yeshiva University students has launched a project called Kol Haneshama (Every Soul) to memorialize Israeli terror victims. The project will feature a full page of short, personal biographies and photographs of Israeli victims beginning this week in Jewish newspapers across North America. Dozens of newspapers have agreed to allocate a free monthly page to the project. High school students will research and compose the material. For details, call (917) 226-0861 or (646) 734-1144.

Catholics Join Jews

NEW YORK — A U.S. Catholic group has joined a proposed boycott of an upcoming show at New York's Jewish Museum. "Usually, it's Catholics the 'creative types' in the artistic community like to offend. Now it's Jews," William Donohue, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, said. The museum says the exhibit, slated to open March 17, seeks to present Nazi horrors in a "thought-provoking" manner. Critics say the exhibit is offensive to Jews, especially Holocaust survivors.

New Chief Rabbi

ROME — An inauguration ceremony was held here Feb. 24 for Rome's new chief rabbi. Thousands of the city's Jews crowded into Rome's ornate main synagogue for the installation of Dr. Riccardo Di Segni, 52. He replaces Rabbi Elio Toaff, who retired in October after 50 years in the post.

UJA Song Windfall

NEW YORK — The rights to the lyrics of one of America's great songwriters will pass to New York's Jewish federation. As a result of Lorenz Hart's bequest, the UJA-Federation of New York could receive as much as $1 million (US) a year, according to a federation official. Hart, who collaborated with composer Richard Rogers, wrote hundreds of songs, including My Funny Valentine and Lady Is a Tramp. The money will go to the federation after the death of Hart's sister-in-law. Hart died in 1943.

Some Prize...

BERLIN — A man who wore an Adolf Hitler mask at a carnival in eastern Germany was arrested last month. The man faces charges of violating the nation's laws against glorification of the Nazi era. Before his arrest, he won the carnival's prize for most original costume.

Peres Downplays Fears, Amid Attacks

PARIS — Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres has downplayed French Jews' fears that their government is not doing enough to combat anti-Semitism. "I am certain that France is not anti-Semitic, neither historically nor currently," Peres told reporters after a meeting last week with French President Jacques Chirac. "I am convinced the French leadership is staging a serious and determined battle against anti-Semitism in France," Peres said.

Confronted with an epidemic of anti-Jewish attacks, French Jewish groups for months have been calling for a strong response from the government. Observers have pointed out that this is an election year in France, where Muslims outnumber Jews by about 10 to 1.

Just after Peres' visit, vandals painted large yellow Stars of David on the windows of a Jewish-owned toy store and a kosher butcher shop in Paris. It was the third such incident in France in February.

As well, two French extremists were convicted of inciting racial hatred. The Feb. 21 convictions of the men, who are members of the far-right National Front, came for their participation in a neo-Nazi march at which "Death to the Jews" was chanted.

UJA Campaign 2002 results are 'unprecedented'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto has "done good," pronounced Michael Bregman at the closing celebration for UJA Federation's Campaign 2002, held last Thursday evening at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

"Our Toronto community rose to the challenge presented by the crisis in Israel, and as a result a lot of needy people in Israel and here will benefit," Bregman said.

This year's campaign has raised more than $47 million in donations and pledges, and David Koschitzky, Bregman's Campaign 2002 co-chair, said he believed the final total will hit $50 million.

The campaign received more than 23,000 individual donations, and raised $6.5 million more than last year. Over the past five years, the final campaign tally has increased by approximately $15 million.

A "challenge fund" that was created to match individual donation increases reached $4.4 million. It was set up in response to a request by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for Diaspora communities to help reduce the impact of Israel's spending transfers from social services to security.

The Toronto campaign results are unprecedented, said David Feldberg, who co-chaired the closing event with Richard Venn. "Campaign 2002, Israel Now and Forever, was a collective expression of unconditional solidarity with Israel," he said.

Bregman reminded the audience of 700 that the campaign had totally shifted focus just prior to its official launch last August in response to the special request by Sharon.

Among the many thanks to staff and volunteers, Bregman said he was lucky to have been paired with Koschitzky. He noted that each of them came from "different streams of Jewish observance" and expressed his hope that they were "one of so many examples of Jewish unity."

Koschitzky, among others, lauded the Toronto Jewish community for its monthly missions to Israel.

'We have no place else to go'

From the editor's desk

He was working in his Jerusalem office Saturday night at around 7 p.m. when the suicide bomber struck, killing nine Israelis and wounding dozens more. He could hear the sirens' wail from his window.

Less than 12 hours later, I met with this senior Israeli foreign ministry official – a veteran of more than 20 years in the service – in a downtown Toronto hotel. Between the time he boarded the plane in Tel Aviv and alighted at Pearson International Airport, 10 more Israelis would be killed by Palestinians.

My mood was as sombre as the bleak, grey Sunday sky. The blustering western winds penetrated my overcoat and sharpened the icy, emotional chill blowing hard from the east.

The ministry official touched down in Toronto on his way to Ottawa where he will be part of the visiting Israeli delegation accompanying Israeli President Moshe Katsav later in the week.

We spoke for almost an hour. The visitor spoke earnestly, emphatically and at length. He never needed prodding to answer; he never backed away from full answers. An Arabist by training, the man sitting across the table from me was an experienced foreign ministry diplomat and counsellor whose duties had taken him to three continents and a number of varied assignments.

What follows are brief excerpts from a conversation that canvassed a wide range of subjects.

Morale of Israel:

"It's very difficult to speak about the morale of Israel on a day when there will be 20 funerals," the diplomat said. "But let me tell you as one born in Israel to parents one of whom came from the Shoah and the other from the Muslim lands... we simply do not have any alternative. We have no place else to go... In the last 18 months, Israelis have shown how resistant we are to the suffering and the violence... We know we are not living in normal times. We are not blind to the situation around us.

"By and large, the country is doing better than expected under the circumstances even though we have suffered severe security and economic shocks."

Palestinian society:

"Despite all the bloodshed and the atrocities... once there is an agreement that will be acceptable to both peoples and not only to the leadership, it will be a matter of time, a relatively short time, until there will be cooperative and friendly relations with the Israelis. We are doomed to live together."

The diplomat would not elaborate how the sides would get to an agreement except to say that the [George] Tenet and [George] Mitchell [plans] are the "corridors."

Seeing I was somewhat taken aback by his optimism, he added, "The younger generation of Palestinians are not all radical Islamists. Generally speaking we should fear the influence of the current situation more than the influence of Iran or other extremists. Once the situation changes, the influence will change."

The next Palestinian leaders:

"People like Mohammed Dahlan, Jibril Rajoub and Marwan Barghouti stand in a better position to play a central in future Palestinian leadership. They are the local militia leaders. They have the gun and the voice... People like Abu Mazen and Abed Rabbo have no power base at all, no support in the territories.

"But we will deal with whoever is empowered to speak for the Palestinians, even if it is Hamas. Even now, we speak with the local militia leaders on a daily basis. Of course we would prefer to see moderate Palestinian leadership. But it is not for Israel to choose; it is for the Palestinians to do so."

Canada-Israel relations:

"The role that Canada is playing in the multilateral framework on refugees is of historical dimension because of former [Canadian] Foreign Minister [John] Manley's publicly expressed readiness more than a year ago, to accept Palestinian refugees in the context of an Israeli-Palestinian agreement. The fact that the recent so-called Saudi initiative excluded any reference to refugees may be the first positive Arab response to that brave Canadian position... I see that as an indirect Saudi reaction to the Canadian position. Saudi Arabia is practically telling Canada that the right of return is not part of an overall peace settlement. Even two weeks since the initiative became public, they have not added the refugee element.

"The visit to Israel by [Canadian] Prime Minister [Jean] Chrétien in April 2000 was extremely important because it exposed him to Israeli realities... He proved to us during that visit how much he understands the situation in the Middle East... We realize the friendship cannot always be translated into favourable policies; we cannot support every statement or action of the Canadian government. But Israel can trust that we have a friend in Ottawa.

"We test that friendship not only by the way Canada votes in the UN, though we would like to see Canada voting more often against anti-Israel resolutions...

"Prime Minister Chrétien and John Manley exerted very real and essential pressure on [Palestinian Authority Chairman] Yasser Arafat last year to do more to stop terrorism. Ultimately, the pressure was not successful but it was essential because it showed Arafat that he cannot look to Canada to rescue him from Israeli and American pressure. We thanked the prime minister and Mr. Manley for their efforts.

"Canada therefore understands why Israel undertakes its actions against Palestinian terror.

"All in all, Canada is a good friend of Israel... We know that [Israeli Foreign Minister] Mr. [Shimon] Peres can call Prime Minister Chrétien without any notice and put forward a request."

Hate crimes soar in 2001, Toronto Police reports

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hate crimes that targeted Muslims shot up in the aftermath of Sept. 11, but Jews remained the single largest victim group in 2001, according to a report prepared by the hate crimes unit of Toronto Police Service.

The number of incidents in Toronto reported to police rose dramatically in 2001, jumping to a record 338 occurrences compared to 204 the year before.

"The 66 per cent increase in reported hate crimes was largely a result of the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attack in the United States," the report states. "Throughout history, crimes of hate have generated imitation, repetition and retaliation... The Toronto Police Service received 121 hate occurrences directly related to the terrorist attacks. This figure represents 90 per cent of the total increase in hate crimes from the year 2000."

Despite the record number of incidents reported to police, only 23 led to criminal charges. Det. James Hogan of the hate crimes unit noted that "the majority of hate occurrences are anonymous offences. They're mischief, spraying paints, anonymous letters, graffiti on buildings. They're cowardly actions... and few brazen events where people stand up and say, 'I'm a racist'."

Breaking down the incidents by victim type, the report says religious groups were the largest population segment targeted in 2001. Jews remained the single largest victim group overall, with 58 incidents reported, while Muslims reported 57 occurrences, up from only one incident the year before.

Det. James Hogan

In a second category described as "multi-bias," (where occurrences involve more than one group), the most frequently affected were Jews, followed by immigrants, visible minorities and the gay community.

In previous years, the black community was the one most targeted, the report stated.

Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, suggested that without the jump in incidents in September and October, 2001 would have been a relatively "normal" year with "no appreciable rise" in incidents.

"Sept. 11 brought out from the rocks and cracks those people with ill feeling towards Muslims and Jews."

Farber noted the number of incidents dropped precipitously in mid-October, when perpetrators saw they weren't generating a fearful response from the rest of Canada.

"In fact, they got the opposite response. Canadians were angry that Jews and Muslims were targeted and these people ran for cover," he said.

Hogan said the rise in incidents is likely attributable to events overseas. "We do notice that when there are negative political developments elsewhere in the world, those developments are reflected here."

At the same time bio-terrorists were sending anthrax-laced letters through the mail in the United States, Canadian copycats sent letters containing a non-lethal white powder to at least seven Jewish agencies in Toronto and Montreal. Buildings were evacuated and some people who came in contact with the powder were prescribed antibiotics as a precaution.

"In the weeks that followed Sept. 11, our community was victimized by a series of anthrax hoaxes and threats directed against communal institutions and leadership," said Nanette Rosen, vice-chair of community relations for Congress.

Some of the threatening letters purported to originate with a radical Islamic group.

"The great Jihad is beginning and in its end we will destroy the Jewish satan and all his servants throughout the world," one letter stated.

In a relatively bright note, the hate crimes unit reported that the activities of organized hate groups seemed "relatively limited" in 2001.

"The majority of these groups have gone underground and group meetings are reserved for select, invited individuals," the report states.

The majority of reported hate occurrences took place in apartment buildings, educational facilities and public locations. The report suggests the data probably underestimates the true number of hate incidents, because of "the historical reluctance of some members of the public to report their hate victimization to police."

Meanwhile in Edmonton, 20-year-old Yousef Sandouga was recently sentenced to one year in jail and three years probation in connection with a firebombing attack on a synagogue that caused minor damage. Sandouga was sentenced after co-operating with police and making voluntary restitution of $1,150 for the damage he caused.

The incident occurred in early November 2000, about a month after the Palestinian intifadah erupted.

"We're very pleased [with the sentence]," said Alvin Goldsman, president of the Jewish Federation of Edmonton. "It sends a strong message that crimes of this nature will not be tolerated."

Weiz, two others, ordered to stand trial

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Ontario judge last week ordered Daniel Weiz and two youths to stand trial on charges of second degree murder in connection with the beating death of Toronto teenager Matti Baranovski.

Judge Cathy Mocha ruled the Crown produced sufficient evidence at a preliminary hearing for the three men to be ordered to stand trial.

Lawyers are scheduled to meet later this month to set a start date for the trial. However, counsel representing the two youths are also asking the Ontario Court of Appeal to overturn a lower court decision that transferrred them to adult court. Ralph Steinberg, who along with Steven Fishbayn is representing one of the young people, said the Appeal Court has yet to hear argument on that issue.

Steinberg would not speculate on a time frame for the case.

Marie Henein, who is acting for Weiz, said she is considering appealing the judge's ruling allowing a trial. Weiz has maintained his innocence throughout.

The incident that sparked the case took place on Nov. 14, 1999, in G. Ross Lord Park in North York. Baranovski was beaten to death by a gang of masked youths demanding cigarettes and money.

Weiz, a native of Israel, was living with his father at the time. He returned to Israel a week after Baranovski's death and subsequently fought Canada's extradition request, taking his case to the Israeli Supreme Court. Israel's High Court allowed the extradition and Weiz was brought to Toronto in October 2000. The preliminary inquiry began in July 2001.

Matti Baranovski

Meanwhile, inside the courtroom Olga Baranovski, Matti's mother, wept openly as the decision to try the three men was announced. Later, surrounded by friends, she told The CJN that the period since the death of her son has been extremely difficult for her.

Matti was her only child, and since his loss, "I don't have anybody... I was killed too, but my body is still alive."

She copes, she said, "with help from friends, but first, God, my best friend. When I feel I'm falling, I ask the Lord to hold me a little bit, because I'm falling.

"And of course, my friends they always support me."

"We put our lives on hold to support Olga," said Gigi Davidson, one of the friends who accompanied her to court.

Linda Buaron-Dray is another friend helping Baranovski get through trying times. Like Baranovski, she too has suffered the loss of a child. They have been in touch for 11 months, ever since her son, Danny, was killed while serving in an elite Israeli commando unit.

She identifies with Baranovski's loss and shares her pain, she said.

Lozanne Wamback is yet another friend who has drawn close to Baranovski.

"She's [like] my sister," Baranovski said.

Almost three years ago, only a few months before Matti was killed, her son, Jonathan, was beaten by a group of young offenders and severely injured.

Their shared experiences drew them close and now she considers Baranovski "part of the family."

"God sent me perfect people, and I'm so glad," Baranovski said.

Arafat's down, but not out: Israeli ambassador

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It may look like Yasser Arafat is washed up, but he's not finished, warned Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada.

Speaking at a meeting of the lawyers and accountants division of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Divon called the Palestinian Authority (PA) chair a very problematic and dangerous opponent. Historically, Arafat has resurrected himself over and over, Divon said.

"He supported the Iraqis during the Gulf War. What could be worse from the point of view of the Western hemisphere? And yet, not only was he resurrected, he's still a hero," Divon told the gathering, held at the home of division co-chair Ariella Rohringer.

Arafat would probably be happy at the prospect of being killed or injured by Israeli bullets, Divon suggested. "He would leave the arena as a martyr."

The PA leader is in a catch-22 situation, the ambassador said. Arafat prefers the clashes of the intifadah and additional misery for his people rather than a return to the negotiating table because he "knows he will have to explain a lot to his people," Divon said.

The most he would get, said Divon, is what was offered before the intifadah at Camp David. Arafat would then have to explain to hundreds of thousands of people who have stayed in refugee camps for decades because of him why most of them would not be returning to their former homes, Divon said.

He said the debate in Israel about the best way to handle the ongoing conflict is "tearing us apart."

Despite the pain, said Divon, "I'm proud that we have this tough debate. It shows we're not afraid to look in the mirror. Every commander knows that he will be accountable for everything he's doing the next morning in the newspaper."

The shooting of eight young soldiers at a roadside checkpoint two weeks ago explains the dilemma well, said Divon. "Now we'll have to be a little tougher, maybe a little more careful. Then of course the international community will criticize us for abusing human rights... The minute [the soldiers] tried to be a little more relaxed... they paid with their lives. So what are we going to do now? These are dilemmas I don't wish on anyone."

Divon said Arafat will not crush the intifadah until he feels international pressure.

In 1981, Israel incurred the wrath of the international community for attacking Iraq's nuclear reactor. "It took less than 10 years for everyone to thank us," said Divon.

The ambassador spoke of a pervasive despair in Israel. "Yes, these are difficult days, but we've had difficult days in the past. We just have to [grit] our teeth and overcome it. For that purpose, we need strong ties between the [Diaspora] Jewish community and Israel." Doing business in Israel or visiting Israel now will bring a sense of fulfillment and achievement unlike any other, he said.

What we should expect from Canada

The president of the State of Israel will be received this week with flourish, fanfare and full honours by the government of Canada and by his Canadian counterpart, Canada's head of state, the governor general. Tonight, President Moshe Katsav shares the spotlight and the dais with Prime Minister Jean Chretien at the 17th CIC Parliamentary Dinner. Tomorrow, he will be honoured at a state dinner hosted by Governor General Adrienne Clarkson.

There is no doubt, therefore, that bilateral relations between the two countries are strong. Indeed, official Israeli spokesmen in Canada and elsewhere, frequently, publicly laud those relations, singling out for praise the burgeoning free trade, commercial, scientific exchange and other aspects of those bilateral relations.

But the strength of the relationship in bilateral terms serves also to highlight how puzzling, disappointing and infuriating are the multilateral aspects of Canada's foreign policy toward Israel.

Once again, Canada abstained, along with Australia, in a vote of 137 in favour and two opposed – Israel and the United States – on a resolution at the United Nations General Assembly that further entrenches and institutionalizes hostility and hatred toward Israel. Last week in New York, the United Nations began the follow-up process of implementing the documents that arose from the scandalous anti-racism conference in Durban last September. The resolution that passed last week will eventually be incorporated into other anti-Israel resolutions and procedures in a variety of UN forums.

Canada "explained" its vote with a severe condemnation of the Durban fiasco. But that explanation is less than a footnote on the pages of history. History will pay it no deference; it will recall only the abstention. Nor will the peoples and the governments around the world, for whom these votes matter, stop to reflect upon and admire its language.

It is simply shocking – after Durban, after Sept. 11, after the alarming revival in Europe and elsewhere of an ugly anti-Semitism in all its sinister, medieval forms and after the virtual declaration of war against Israel by the Palestinian Authority and its allies – that our government appears to have learned nothing from the ominous events currently swirling around Israel and other democracies like a dark, monstrous storm threatening the horizon.

As Prof. Gil Troy wrote last week in The CJN, we must not recoil from speaking "truth to power." The truth about Canada's voting record at the United Nations is that it is unjustifiably, inexcusably, irredeemably shameful. It supports the despots and tyrants of the world against the sole democracy in the Middle East. It supports the blatant, undisguised campaign to dismantle the Jewish State. It also violates fundamental Canadian values. As Canadian citizens, we expect and deserve better from our government.

Upset with CJN columnists

In the past two issues of The CJN, I have found the tone of a number of your columnists to be somewhat arrogant. First, Sheldon Kirshner and his simply dumbfounding suggestion that arch-terrorist Yasser "kill-the-Jews" Arafat is facing his "moment of truth" (for real this time).

Then, with staggering chutzpah, Shira Herzog reveals to readers her own personal "ambivalence" regarding Israeli reservists' refusal to serve in the territories, "ruing the day" that citizens fail to overlook morality and humanity even when there are existential security concerns (!).

Lastly, I believe that Elliot Malamet's column would do best to address practical issues for parents and grandparents and others on how to educate children (and others) Jewishly, with love and wisdom. I'm less interested in quotations from various educational gurus and more interested in what he wants to do to change the state of Jewish education – or who's doing what and making a difference.

I humbly request less pontification on the pages of your fine newspaper.

Good time to visit Israel

We are aware, of course, that Israel has been going through one of the most difficult periods of its history. The violence of the intifadah is designed to be primarily a psychological weapon, to undermine Israel's morale and make the country feel isolated.

In the Diaspora, Jewish people often feel that what they have to offer in the way of support doesn't make any real difference. But there is something we can do that will make every difference: go and visit.

Just by being there, even lying on the beach, we will be doing a world of good. Israeli economists calculate that every holiday-maker saves a job. And there are very powerful, intangible benefits that go beyond this vital economic contribution.

It's the truest expression of solidarity to be alongside Israelis in their hour of need. To Israelis, assailed on all sides, it means a great deal.

Although it is understandable to be hesitant about visiting Israel at the moment, a recent poll of tourists in Israel found that 70 per cent admitted to having had "concerns" before booking their trip. But that same poll found that having had their holiday, an overwhelming 94 per cent planned to encourage friends and family back home to visit Israel now.

From a financial point of view, there's never been a better time to go on holiday to Israel. Contact your travel agent soon for reservations. You will not be sorry. Israel will welcome you.

Mideast insane asylum

What we now have in the Middle East is an insane asylum. And the lunatics in charge – the Israeli hawks and the Palestinian terrorists – set the agenda and control the flow of events.

There will not be peace until new leadership emerges on both sides. Both Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon must go. Their ideas and strategies are equally bankrupt. Both are men with nightmare visions at a time when inspiration is required.

At least for the time being, this conflict cannot be left exclusively in the hands of the Israelis and Palestinians – whatever may be the implications of interfering in other people's affairs. Surely we have learned since Sept. 11 that conflicts of this kind now affect us all: nations can no longer sequester themselves from the rest of the world. We have become Marshall McLuhan's global village!

What we need is a way for responsible people of goodwill from all sides of the conflict to come together: Israelis, Palestinians, Arabs, Jews, Muslims, Christians, Europeans, Asians, Africans, Americans... to say "enough" and to initiate an honest and meaningful peace dialogue.

Dialogue is what mostly has been missing since the assassination of former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin: truly, we should now understand the immensity of that calamity. And if the recent Saudi Arabian initiative is a prologue to such dialogue, then let us give it a heartfelt welcome.

'Second echelon' Palestinians on the right of return

By LISA ARMONY

Palestinian Authority representative in Jerusalem Sari Nusseibeh is no stranger to controversy on both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian divide. He has been charged several times by Israeli authorities with engaging in subversive activities and even spent time in Israeli jails in the 1980s. He has also been assaulted by fellow Palestinians for expressing moderate views of the conflict. It is not surprising then that he is in the midst of an ideological maelstrom that has drawn the wrath of those who advocate for the so-called Palestinian "right of return."

Over the past few months, Nusseibeh has stated publicly that in the interest of fulfilling their nationalist goals of self-determination and statehood, Palestinians should abandon their insistence on what they claim to be the right of several million refugees and their descendants, displaced in wars imposed on Israel by the Arab states, to return to their homes in pre-1948 Israel. In a September 2001 article published in the Israeli and Palestinian press, Nusseibeh pointed to three fundamental obstacles that have impeded the realization of peace, including the incompatibility of a two-state solution with the Palestinian demand to resettle in Israel. "The Palestinians' insistence that Israel allow these refugees to return to their original homes and lands will...lead to failure," he wrote.

Abu Mazen

Nusseibeh's comments sparked outrage among grassroots "right of return" advocates. Al-Awda, a coalition whose name translates to "the return," launched a campaign calling on Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat to dismiss Nusseibeh from his appointment as political representative in East Jerusalem (to which Arafat has not responded). Some have even suggested that Nusseibeh has betrayed his people by abusing his office and his connection to western media in order to deal a blow to international support for "basic Palestinian rights."

Abed Rabbo

Nusseibeh clarified his position in an open letter to Al-Awda following its appeal to Arafat. The Palestinians could have adopted one of two mutually exclusive strategies to resolve their conflict with Israel, he explained. A strategy based on individual rights could have advocated for Palestinian resettlement and equality in Israel. However, according to Nusseibeh, by accepting the Oslo accords, the Palestinians adopted de facto a collective, national strategy based on the struggle for self-determination and statehood. That strategy necessarily implies Palestinian consent to address the problem of refugee resettlement within the borders of the future Palestinian state. Nusseibeh is saying, in essence, that the Palestinians cannot have it both ways, and as long as they continue to operate under the Oslo framework, their intransigence on refugee resettlement in Israel will be the ultimate deal breaker. Indeed, reports indicate that this issue was one of the main reasons the Camp David talks of July 2000 failed.

For Israel, the influx of large numbers of Palestinians constitutes, according to Oslo architect Yossi Beilin, "the reddest of the red lines." This sentiment is echoed across the political spectrum because a collective Palestinian movement to Israel would alter the country's demographic balance. Some Palestinians have sought to assuage Israel's concern by claiming that most refugees would not settle in Israel because they do not wish to live under Israeli sovereignty, because their property no longer exists, or because they have already resettled elsewhere. They claim that the symbolic "right" is more important than the actual "return," and that an Israeli acknowledgment of its alleged role in creating the refugee problem – which leading historians have found to be without basis – would suffice to heal the deep wound that displacement has left on the Palestinian national psyche. But responses by some refugee advocates to Nusseibeh's proposition indicate that there is nothing at all symbolic in their demand.

Salman Abu-Sitta, who has written extensively on this issue, stated in an open response to Nusseibeh that establishing a Palestinian state "has nothing to do with the exercise of the 'right of return.'" The force behind disingenuous studies on the feasibility of Palestinian resettlement in Israel, Abu Sitta claims that such resettlement would not alter the country's demographic balance since "78 per cent of the country's Jewish population lives on 14 per cent of its territory." Land previously owned by Palestinians, his studies state, is largely empty save for "religious Jews" and "154,000 [sic] kibbutzim and moshavim." One study concludes: "If we return [the Lebanon and Gaza refugees], the Jewish areas will not be affected at all. Theoretically, the Jews will not even feel their presence."

This thinly veiled argument, put forth by the PLO's refugee department, considers Israel's demography in only a narrow sense and applies it to arbitrarily defined "Jewish" and "Palestinian" areas, purposely ignoring the overall effect that a flood of Palestinian refugees would have on Israel's national Jewish character.

Other organizations condemn Nusseibeh for what they call his indifference to Palestinian popular will, and even more troubling, for his acceptance of a two-state solution that would preserve each state's Jewish and Arab characters. Badil, a Bethlehem-based Palestinian refugee advocacy group, responding to Nusseibeh, affirmed its rejection of Israel in its current composition because, the organization claims, a national character defined as Jewish is inherently discriminatory against the state's non-Jewish citizens.

Israel, Badil suggests, should not be accepted by the international community until it casts off its Jewish identity and becomes a state of all its citizens. This would allow for the resettlement of Palestinians in Israel's pre-1948 borders. Badil has even gone so far as to reinterpret the Partition Plan formulated in UN Resolution 181, holding that the United Nations never intended to create two states based on Jewish and Arab ethno-national-religious characters, but rather to establish two states governed by equality and non-discrimination – again suggesting that Israel as a Jewish state is inherently discriminatory and therefore illegitimate.

In seeking to bring about an agreeable settlement to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Nusseibeh has revealed a dangerous element within Palestinian society that confirms Israel's worst fears concerning the alleged "right of return." To those who promote this view, the campaign for return is an effort to undermine Israel's existence as a Jewish homeland and to render it no more than the 23rd Arab state.

Sari Nusseibeh

Fortunately, Palestinians do not speak with uniformity of voice when it comes to this matter. While Nusseibeh's statements may reflect his personal view and not official Palestinian policy, others within the PA have likewise expressed a more pragmatic approach to resolving this dilemma than that articulated by the grassroots community.

Significantly, the Beilin-Abu Mazen plan of 1995, which was to have served as the blueprint for a permanent agreement to the conflict, proposed that the refugee problem be solved through a combination of rehabilitation in the refugees' current place of residence, relocation to the Palestinian state that would be created or to countries that would absorb them, and compensation. An understanding was reached that only a small number of refugees would be permitted to enter Israel under a family reunification plan and in special humanitarian circumstances.

This formula was the foundation of the refugee component of former U.S. president Bill Clinton's plan and the Taba talks of late 2000. In fact, according to Beilin, a number of important agreements were reached at Taba on the nature of compensation and options for rehabilitation. Equally as important, if not more so, the two sides came very close to a mutually agreeable narrative that would explain how the refugee situation was created. The progress made at Taba, says Beilin, substantially narrowed the distance under dispute between the parties.

More recently, senior Palestinian negotiator Yasser Abed Rabbo stated during a U.S. speaking tour that the implementation of the "'right of return'... must be done in such a way as to not adversely affect the Jewish nature of the State of Israel." He implied that while he could never forget his personal attachment to Jaffa, his birthplace, he would be willing to make painful concessions on this matter as a serious politician responsible for the future of his people.

Regrettably, the flexibility articulated by this second echelon of Palestinian statesmen does not emanate from the top. In his Feb. 3 New York Times op-ed, Arafat, attempting to create a semblance of moderation for his North American audience, suggested that the Palestinians "understand Israel's demographic concerns" regarding the "right of return." Yet Arafat did not propose a solution that would take these concerns into account. Rather, his obduracy was revealed only a few sentences later when he wrote, "Israelis too must be realistic in understanding that there can be no solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict if the legitimate rights of these innocent civilians continue to be ignored... How is a Palestinian refugee to understand that his or her right of return will not be honoured but those of Kosovar Albanians, Afghans and East Timorese have been?"

Among Palestinians, the debate over the resolution of the refugee problem will likely continue, particularly as many refugees and their descendants feel it is they, and not the PA, who are entitled to determine their fate. Nonetheless, by challenging entrenched positions on this divisive issue, individuals such as Nusseibeh, Abu Mazen and Abed Rabbo give cause for the hope that one of the main obstacles hindering a permanent peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinians may someday be overcome.

When judges cheat

The judges I refer to in the headline are not a part of our judicial system; they are the men and women who judge sporting events and, particularly, the Olympics. The cognoscenti agreed that Canadian skaters Jamie Salé and David Pelletier were deserving of receiving the gold medal in the pair skating competition. There had been pressures on one judge to vote a certain way, for arrangements had already been made in advance who was to win and who was not. When this became public knowledge, the protest was loud and vigorous, forcing the Olympic bigwigs to award the Canadian skaters a gold medal after all.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Honesty is, or should be, a fundamental aspect of sporting competition. Anyone who has played social tennis knows that the game relies on the honesty of the participants. Mistakes will creep into this process from time to time but, generally, sportsmanship prevails and assures that the better competitor gets the palm.

But for some years it has appeared that in certain international competitions the rules of honesty are occasionally suspended. Some judges are pressured to vote a certain way and the fix is in. This has moved some observers to suggest that any competition that requires judges rather than clocks and tapes should be omitted from international competitions.

During the recent games, my son and I had long discussions about these matters – something that no doubt went on in many households. He came up with an interesting suggestion: with the enormous advance of computerized technology, it should be possible to determine what is a perfect performance in a sport like skating, and if that is possible, it will decide which performance was closest to the standard of perfection.

In any case, the search for solutions has become an urgent enterprise and, in the end, it will likely be an objective instrument like a computer that will have the final word.

Unfortunately, this problem is another piece of evidence that we are slowly losing more and more respect for the integrity of people and instead believing that only machines will ultimately come up with something reliable.

Too bad – it appears that our belief in the perfection of the human race has run up against too many contrary experiences. What lies at the end of this downward spiral is this: we do not trust anyone, and not even ourselves. Therefore, let the machines take over.

Despite all this, I have not yet lost faith that we can do better, and I hope we will.

Who will be a Jew?

Here we go again. With the recent Israeli High Court decision that converts who undergo a non-Orthodox conversion in Israel must be registered on their identity cards as Jewish, the debate rekindles as to who has the authority to perform conversions. Make no mistake about it: it is not the process of conversion that is at issue. At issue is not only the authority of the rabbi performing that conversion but, more ominous for the future of Judaism, the right of Israel's religious power structure to dictate Jewish identity. (The idea of a "J" on one's identity card conjures up unhappy memories, but that is another issue.)

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Today in North America alone it is estimated that 4,000 Reform conversions and 2,000 Conservative conversions, as well as an unknown number of Orthodox conversions, are performed each year. These Jews by choice, of whatever denomination, bring amazing commitment to their communities and families, and are a growing source of great potential for Judaism.

Reactions to the court decision range from outrage on the part of the Orthodox establishment and the secular right-wing to glee on the secular left. According to a press release I read, Israel's Orthodox-controlled Interior Ministry is considering instructing its clerks to indicate "Reform" or "Conservative" Jews on Israeli identity cards.

So what is really going on here?

In biblical times, a woman who married an Israelite man became a member of his tribe (no pun intended). Her children were Israelites by virtue of their father's identity. Conversion, for which there was no real word before 586 BCE, meant marrying an Israelite spouse, as Ruth did.

Once Jews were exiled to Babylon they had to re-think identity. By the time of the Maccabees, whole nations, like the Idumeans (from whom Herod the Builder and Butcher descended), were being forcibly "converted." Joining the Jewish nation had a lot to do with fighting and demographic expansion. We look in vain for a tidy description of the process which reversed the parental determination of "Jewish." By the time of the Mishnah, it is the mother who determined the Jewishness of the child.

The Mishnah is occupied with order, classification and outcome: in this instance, a Jewish household and continuity of the faith. Today, I fear the leaders involved in this debate are preoccupied with power, exclusivity and control. But the world has changed since the year 200 CE.

If the Orthodox in Israel want to involve the state in religion – exemptions for yeshiva students, money for their separate schools, enforced Shabbat closures, exclusive control of marriage and divorce, just to name a few – then they will have to accept the state's jurisdiction elsewhere, as in the matter of identity.

Sadly it looks to me like the arguments are not "for the sake of heaven," as they should be, but for the sake of political control. The refusal to accept that Judaism is able to embrace denominationalism and plural approaches to Jewish life, lore and practice, will only further erode civil discourse in Israel and in the Diaspora.

The rebirth of a Jewish state after 2,000 years of statelessness has challenged us to reinvent what part religion plays in that state. There is little precedent in our history for the kind of governance Israel is now called upon to create. There are few models for her to emulate. Where Jews over the centuries lived in countries where state-mandated religions existed, their experiences were not happy. Until the Enlightenment, Jews fared best, for a number of reasons, in Muslim countries and worst in Christian ones.

Jewish communities in North America have evolved in societies where church and state are separate entities. For Jews, pluralism and this separation have worked wonderfully well. In fact, today we look to the Muslim world to see where state and church intertwine. Pluralism denotes a richness in debate that the early rabbinic tradition celebrated and included in its final texts.

I don't usually quote U.S. President George W. Bush's speechwriters, but his recent words bear repetition. "In a free society," the president said, "diversity is not disorder. Debate is not strife. And dissent is not revolution." He was talking to the Chinese, but his admonition fits Israel's situation. And what does that tell us?

Happy birthday Mozart

I never knew (or cared, for that matter) when Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart was born. But I learned a couple of weeks ago that the great composer's birthday was January 27, 1756. I would have remained blissfully ignorant had I not stopped to read the handmade poster on the wall at our neighbourhood Montessori school.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

As parents attending an open house were herded through the facility, I glanced at Mozart's stern visage and wondered out loud if the fact that it was his birthday meant that his mom had to bring snack. Inside, I wondered why my two-turning-three-year-old daughter Cari would need to know when Mozart was born. Next she'd want to know when Vivaldi or, God forbid, Wagner entered the world. All this from a kid whose greatest entertainment is colouring on her feet.

We're looking for 2½ days a week of care and learning for Cari beginning next September. She's currently at Aleph Bet, a Jewish day care. Keeping her there next year is one option; Montessori is another. A third option is junior kindergarten at the local Jewish school. (There's probably some expert at some university who believes that sending a child to one year instead of two years of junior kindergarten diminishes intellectual capacity, reduces the chance of getting into a good university and is symptomatic of bad parenting.)

Aleph Bet is what a Jewish day care should be. It smells like a day care—that smell every parent knows but can't quite describe. The Hebrew alphabet is on the wall. Wearing oversized, black nylon kippot, the kids start the day with a short, fidgety version of Shacharit on the floor. I know almost every kid there. My wife actually does know every kid there. You shmooze with other parents at drop-off and pickup times. There's child-made Jewish art in our kitchen. Cari came home a few weeks ago singing a Tu b'Shvat song I had never heard before. It feels right.

Still, the Montessori option is compelling. The program takes children in directions a day care simply can't. At Montessori, they're exploring the basics of geometry, cartography and science with kids who still think Barney is a real dinosaur. The environment is serene and pristine. The tiny students, I'm told, are well-mannered, orderly and eerily respectful. They take turns at the snack table and gently choose their daily activities. They're calm. There's no screaming.

So, we're stuck. Will it be Montessori or Aleph Bet?

Part of the preschool decision is always about logistics—getting everyone to where they have to be and back.

A typical morning conversation at our house:

"I'll feed Noah. You pack Cari's lunch and knapsack. Don't forget her blanket in the dryer."

"I have to leave early for work. You take Cari to Aleph Bet; I'll take Noah to the sitter."

"Can't. You have to take Cari. I have a meeting downtown before I go to my office."

"Fine. You pack Cari's lunch. I'll take Noah to the sitter now and come back for Cari."

"No time for that. Cari will close her eyes, tap her heels together and magically arrive at the day care. Noah is too little to tap his heels together. I'll just call a courier."

"Perfect."

As you can imagine, we're not looking for any further clock-related challenges. That's a real knock against junior kindergarten and Montessori. It starts when it starts and it ends when it ends. Score one for the flexible day-care arrangement.

Still, there's something more going on here. While we haven't decided for sure where Cari will go this fall, I can't help but think that the decision we make today is about more than next year. Part of me believes the decision we make today about our two-year-old is a statement about what we want for her entire formal education.

Keeping Cari at Aleph Bet—despite the curricular challenges of a day care setting—sends a message to her and to our community that we value a Jewish environment. It's a message to our daughter that we want her to sing Hebrew songs, bring home Chanukah art and celebrate her community.

If we end up keeping Cari at Aleph Bet, I'll take personal responsibility for teaching her about Mozart's birthday.

The Kirshner File

After a year, Sharon offers more of the same

Calling it "the year of terror," Israel's police inspector-general recently reported that Palestinian terrorist attacks increased by 337 per cent in 2001, even though 80 per cent of them had been foiled. In 1,794 incidents, including 31 suicide bombings, 208 Israelis were killed and 1,523 wounded.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"We have been through a year of violence and terror the likes of which we have not seen in the history of the state," he observed, referring to the Palestinian uprising, now in its 17th month. And in a bleak warning, he said he expected an escalation of shootings, bombings and shellings.

It's clear beyond any reasonable doubt that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who succeeded Ehud Barak a year ago on March 7, 2001 with a promise to bring Israel peace and security, has abysmally failed to fulfill his election campaign pledge. It has proven to be empty rhetoric.

Amid mounting despair and helplessness, and signs that his popularity is slipping, a consensus is emerging that Sharon has no definitive plan to end the spiralling bloodshed and that he has virtually lost control of the deteriorating security situation.

In the past few weeks, the intifadah has grown still more menacing, devouring an unprecedented number of Israeli and Palestinian lives in tit-for-tat strikes. By last week, the uprising – the second one in about a decade and the third since the 1936-1939 Arab Revolt – had claimed more than 300 Israelis and more than 1,000 Palestinians. It is a fearsome death toll that scathingly mocks the promise of the expired Oslo peace process, brings back memories of Israel's disastrous entanglement in Lebanon, discourages aliyah (immigration dropped by 28 per cent in 2001) and weakens the economy (Israel has slipped into a recession).

Since the breakdown of the latest ceasefire – the ninth since September 2000 – Palestinian gunmen have dramatically improved their tactics and capabilities, raising fears that the intifadah has yet to peak and giving rise to commentaries that there is no military answer to terrorism.

Consider the most recent events.

• The Palestinians, for the first time ever, destroyed the pride of Israel's armoured corps, a 65-ton Merkava III battle tank, killing three soldiers.

• The Palestinians, having unsheathed homemade mortars last April, introduced the locally-produced Kassam-2 rocket in February. The short-range Kassam, though crude, has the potential to terrorize Israel's population, denials by Israel's chief of military intelligence notwithstanding.

• The Palestinians, after murdering a mother and a daughter in a kibbutz, dispatched a suicide bomber into Kamei Shomron, a Jewish settlement in the heart of the West Bank, and killed two teenagers. The assault, the first of its kind, suggested that the intifadah may have shifted focus, to Jewish settlers and soldiers in the territories rather than against civilians in Israel itself.

• The Palestinians gunned down six Israeli soldiers at a checkpoint near Ramallah and escaped with impunity, sending an unmistakable signal that their resistance to Israel's occupation will be met with fire. Last week, after another suicide bombing in Jerusaelm which claimed nine lives, a Palestinian sniper killed a further 10 Israelis – seven soldiers and three civilians – at another checkpoint in the West Bank.

Retaliating ferociously, Israel pounded Palestinian Authority buildings and bases by air, land and sea, and announced plans to intensify operations, including more raids into Palestinian refugee camps. Sharon, who rode to power on a wave of Palestinian violence after the failure of the Camp David summit in July 2000, essentially offers war-weary Israelis more of the same: more retaliatory bombings, more incursions into Area A (territory under full Palestinian control), more targeted killings and arrests of Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Fatah militants, more blockades of Palestinian towns such as Nablus and Jenin, more internal closures, more roadblocks and more home demolitions – all of which cripple the Palestinian Authority's already shaky economy and feed Palestinian rage and rejection of coexistence.

On Feb. 21, in a televised speech to the nation, Sharon unveiled a fairly new wrinkle: buffer zones to protect Israel's borders. He did not spell out the details, but the Palestinians condemned the idea.

After a year on the job, Sharon has been thrust into a conflict-management, rather than a conflict-resolution, mode, and his attempts to crush the intifadah and marginalize Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat have impressed neither Israel's right nor left.

Hawks to the right of Sharon, from former premier Benjamin Netanyahu on down, think they have a solution: Israel should reoccupy the West Bank, dismantle the Palestinian Authority and send Arafat packing. Some even advocate the expulsion of Palestinians from the territories. The far-right, which may yet pose the greatest threat to Sharon's political viability, is also incensed by Sharon's acceptance of Palestinian statehood, circumscribed though it may be. Last December, two ministers in the national unity government, Avigdor Lieberman and Benny Elon, tabled a motion forbidding Israel " to negotiate directly or indirectly on the establishment of a Palestinian state without the cabinet's approval."

In the interest of achieving an armistice, Sharon would tolerate a demilitarized, discontiguous Palestinian state in about 42 per cent of the West Bank and in parts of Gaza. It is a far cry from the days when he championed the Jordan-is-Palestine option, and sought to retain every inch of the territories.

In his heart of hearts, one suspects, Sharon wants to unseat Arafat, with whom he severed ties last December. But in deference to the United States and the Labor party, a key coalition partner, he has resisted entreaties to topple the Palestinian Authority and, with it, Arafat, his perennial nemesis.

Ariel Sharon

Sharon, however, has not hesitated to call for an "alternative" Palestinian leadership, made no secret of his loathing for Arafat and his wish for Arafat's disappearance and voiced regret he did not assassinate him in 1982, when Israel had Beirut under siege.

Nor did Sharon endear himself to the right when, on Jan. 31, he met with three of Arafat's closest associates, Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), Ahmed Qureia (Abu Ala) and Mohammed Rashid. Sharon's adversaries need not worry. Abu Ala has said he will not meet with Sharon again until Israel stops its "aggressive policy."

Sharon's critics on the left are just as vocal. They argue that the current situation is untenable and that Israel's occupation, in addition to corrupting and coarsening Israeli society, will eventually transform Israel into a de facto binational state and thus endanger its fundamental Jewish character and purpose.

They believe that Sharon's vow not to negotiate under fire, and his concomitant insistence on seven days of complete calm before the Mitchell recommendations can be implemented, are not only shortsighted but foolhardy.

As Shlomo Gazit, former head of Israeli military intelligence, put it: "Anyone who makes the resumption of negotiations conditional upon the absolute cessation of violence is giving any mad terrorist (veto power) to determine whether an agreement will be reached... Yitzhak Rabin understood and famously said: 'We shall fight terror as if there were no negotiations, and we shall negotiate as if there were no terror.'"

Gazit and like-minded Israelis are demanding that Sharon activate the Mitchell plan, which Israel and the Palestinians have embraced, as soon as possible. Under its provisions, Israel and the Palestinians would agree to an unconditional ceasefire. A truce would be followed by cooling-off and confidence-building periods and political talks aimed at settling Israel's historic dispute with the Palestinians.

In addition, Sharon's critics, on the left and right, have proposed a unilateral withdrawal from Gaza and much of the West Bank, most of which is still administered by Israel. One thousand reserve generals, colonels and Shin Bet and Mossad officials, all of them members of the Council for Peace and Security, have published a manifesto promoting this idea. Sharon is less than keen about it.

Nor is Sharon enthusiastic about Foreign Minister Shimon Peres' four-point peace plan, which he developed in concert with Qureia. The first phase calls for a ceasefire and implementation of the Mitchell report, including a freeze on Israeli settlement construction beyond the Green Line. Israel and the Palestinians would then recognize each other's sovereignty, based on United Nations resolutions 242 and 338. Final peace talks would be concluded within 12 months, and an international peacekeeping force would guarantee the sanctity of the agreement.

Sharon, who claims he is ready to make "painful concessions" to advance the cause of peace, prefers interim accords, but the Palestinians have adamantly rejected this approach. Although they scoffed at Barak's sweeping concessions, the Palestinians are now, once again, demanding final status talks.

In every generation...

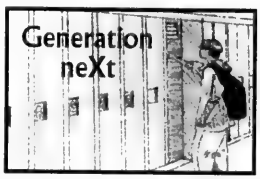
By MARK DANIELS and JASON ROTSTEIN

The warning signs were clear. We grew up too fast. Simply put, we were too content in our younger, more impressionable years to notice that the world was not going to stop for us.

But why wouldn't we be? The unspoken ideal of all of our parents is to raise us behind a protective barrier, that we should never need to know first hand the horrors of war. It is not surprising, therefore, that we, too, were assimilated into this shelter. Like all those around us, we grew up believing that our home, our country, our world was secure. How unfortunate that the world often admits a level of optimism unsubstantiated by reality. We were not prepared for what was to come.

Our great grandparents fought in World War I, and then promised it would be the "war to end all wars." Not 25 years later, their children fought a different battle, and we remember the Holocaust so that it will never happen again. Our parents experienced Vietnam, the Six Day War, the Yom Kippur War and the Gulf War. They all had the same hope that the world would improve following their efforts to restore peace, and they shielded their children from it.

Never again, they said, and never again, we repeated, robotically. Yet Santayana warned, "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it." Every generation in our history has faced its own Amalek, so why should we be any different? It should have been inevitable that someone like Osama Bin Laden would invade our sanctuary. But then why were we so unprepared for the events of Sept. 11?



As Jews living in the post-Sept. 11 era, we try to distance ourselves from the prevailing pessimistic outlook that has arisen in modern western civilization, that only by expecting the worst can we free ourselves from subsequent torture. Accepting any disaster as a "normal" occurence would remove morality and conscience from our way of life. The entire philosophy of Amalek is founded on this basic principle: everything is happenstance, dictated by chance, or by fate.

However, being children of the afflicted ourselves, we have adopted a more constructive response, as expressed by Rabbi Nachman of Braslav, who found a remedy for such cynicism – "The whole world is a narrow bridge; the important thing is not to fear." With this in mind, we commit our energy to the productivity of humankind.

If nothing else, the events of Sept. 11 should teach us that we cannot continue a level of such complacency and self-assurance in humankind as we so naïvely have maintained in the last few decades. We must recognize the potential for evil inherent in human nature and, as such, give our decisions a little more weight, and develop a degree of sensitivity in our response to tragedy. It is therefore incumbent upon us, after the scare, to alert future generations and to inculcate not a sense of terror, but of vigilance and awareness. The test of our survival may unfortunately strip us of our innocence, but perhaps, ultimately, it will give rise to a vision of a safer world, one that could avert future tragedies.

Looking back on Sept. 11

Ethiopian Jews need cultural centre: activist

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some Ethiopian Jewish mothers look out at their children standing aimlessly in the streets and wonder if their pilgrimage to Israel was worth it.

Parents don't understand why their children have become so alienated from the system and from their heritage, said Baruch Tagegne.

Since its inception, Israel has absorbed different waves of immigrants from widely diverse backgrounds and cultures, at the same time as it has had to cope with all of its other concerns.

Meeting the needs of the Ethiopian Jewish community is one of Israel's current challenges.

Here to raise money and awareness to build a Culture and Heritage Centre for Ethiopian Jews in Rehovot, known as the Tomer Project, the soft-spoken Tagegne discussed the importance of giving the Ethiopian community a place of its own.

Tagegne, who was born in a village outside of Gondar, escaped to Israel in 1974 through several African countries. During those years, over 4,000 Ethiopian Jews perished trying to reach Israel. He believes that the story of their heritage and immigration must be told.

The city of Rehovot has donated the land for the centre which will be dedicated to learning and knowledge and become a repository for Ethiopian historical artifacts and exhibits.

The centre will be used as a museum for tourism as well as a focal point for community events.

"Ethiopian Jewish youth need to be able to identify with something else besides the American Blacks that they see on television," he said.

"We need to show our children that they have a deep-rooted and respected culture so they can develop a pride in their own heritage.

"Right now," Tagegne noted, "some of our children are being taken from their parents and put in religious boarding schools at very young ages."

They are not taught about their own history or traditions and do not understand or relate to their parents, he said, adding that "eventually they drop out of school and wind up on the streets."

Baruch Tagegne

The younger generation of Ethiopian Jews are turning into "second-class citizens in Israel," Tagegne said.

"This generation is disconnected from their heritage and have no identity of their own. They're not Israeli or Ethiopian."

Although an Institute of the Heritage of Ethiopian Jews was promised in 1989, the Israeli government has not yet managed to fulfill its obligations, noted former Israeli absorption minister Yair Tzaban in a statement written in support of the centre.

"I recognize it as both a responsibility and a privilege to lend a hand and become a partner in this significant project," Tzaban stated.

Beta Yisrael, as Ethiopian Jews prefer to be called, are believed to date back to the time of King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba.

Over the centuries, they remained isolated from Jews of other communities until they began immigrating to Israel in treks over Africa. Through two dramatic operations, thousands of Ethiopian Jews were spirited into Israel.

The challenges related to the absorption of the Jews from Ethiopia have been on Israel's public agenda to varying degrees since the mid-1980s when the first group began to arrive.

Over the years, one of the key challenges, widely acknowledged among Israeli authorities, is the poverty affecting a large portion of the community. The current Israeli economic downturn has only exacerbated many of the problems related to the successful integration of the Ethiopian Jews.

Diaspora communities, including the Federation of Greater Toronto, have attempted through various projects to ameliorate the absorption-related difficulties of the Ethiopian Jews.

For Tagegne part of the answer lies in the building of a community centre.

"Every community in Israel has their corner – Russian, Yemenite, Moroccan. Our children need to see that they also have a place of their own in order to facilitate their absorption," Tagegne said.

"It is now or never. Ethiopian elders are dying and their oral traditions will go with them if a cultural centre isn't established to house their artifacts and memories."

Bring in the B'nai Menashe

By MYER SAMRA

Guest Voice

Although we are proud of our religion, we Jews have difficulty accepting people who want to join us. With 2,000 years of persecution behind us, we are naturally suspicious of converts. Surely anyone wanting to become Jewish must be crazy, and thus unacceptable.

As well, now that Israel is well-established and relatively prosperous, we are suspicious of potential converts from poorer countries. Some argue that letting in people such as the B'nai Menashe, a group from northeast India who have Asian racial features, could inspire half the world's poor to try to convert and use the Law of Return to seek entry into Israel, or use it as a gateway to the affluent West. Either way, a would-be convert can't win.

We also seem more willing to accept Russian Christians as converts or as settlers in Israel, even without conversion, than people with the "wrong" racial backgrounds.

These attitudes reveal a failure to appreciate that Judaism is a world religion with a universal message that has attracted admirers and potential converts from many different backgrounds in many different eras. Even the most pious of Jews does not know his or her ancestry well enough to trace a pedigree back to Sinai. Even in the most trying times in Jewish history, we have taken in converts.

We should also not forget that, historically, royal families, and with them a significant number of their subjects, adopted Judaism in places as diverse as Adiabene (northern Iraq), Himyar (Yemen), and Khazaria (the Crimea). Today, their descendants are completely indistinguishable from other Jews.

Last Chanukah, the B'nai Menashe, celebrated 25 years of practising Judaism in an environment where they have risked social ostracism for their faith.

About 600 of them have successfully settled in Israel and have formally converted to Judaism. They have, in the main, continued to practise Judaism, served in the army and worked to support their families.

At the same time, the 3,500 still in India can't complete their conversion to Judaism before a beit din. Most conversions take one or two years to complete. The B'nai Menashe have endured a far longer "apprenticeship."

If they were not genuine in their convictions, one could not imagine people praying as Jews, diligently studying Halachah, and translating siddurim and other holy books into their languages (Mizo and Thadou). They have a strong commitment to the religion they have chosen to follow.

As to aliyah, the B'nai Menashe's numbers are quite small and readily absorbable. Israel has accepted 50 to 100 B'nai Menashe settlers per year since 1989. At this rate, one can imagine a second generation of B'nai Menashe, and perhaps a third, raising families and practising Judaism without being accepted as Jews.

As well, the policy of admitting a small number each year has created a gulf between those who are proud to be able to join a minyan anywhere in the world and those who are conscious they are not accepted as genuine Jews. This gulf is bound to cause friction, as those already in Israel will seek to bring their relatives, at the expense of families not represented among the settlers. The potential for such a division in such a small community, with two equally committed parts, should be scotched immediately.

The time has come to assist all B'nai Menashe who wish to convert to Judaism and permit them to settle in Israel if they choose to do so. The Knesset's immigration committee is set to consider the question of B'nai Menashe aliyah. Let us join together to urge the Knesset to make the right decision.

A mission to remember

By ELLEN and MICHAEL SIEGEL

Guest Voice

We just returned from a UJA Federation-Mizrachi solidarity mission to Israel which included Jews of all denominations. What an incredible week-long trip it was!

Everywhere we went, Israelis approached us with thanks that we came to Israel to stand together with them. We were all embarrassed at this attention because we clearly felt we were the ones who should thank them for their strength, determination and courage.

When we arrived in Israel on Feb. 25, we immediately travelled to the Dolphinarium in Tel Aviv for a short memorial service to mourn the loss of 22 young people whose lives were cut short by a suicide bomber. It was a sad beginning to our trip.

However we quickly realized that Israel could and would carry on.

We visited an IDF base in the Golan Heights where we were given a briefing by the base commander. He had been up all night for a military operation in Nablus, but still considered it important to meet us. After talking to us, he returned to Nablus.

That same evening we were heartbroken to hear that six young soldiers were ambushed and killed by terrorists, near Ramallah. In fact, almost every day, we heard of someone killed or injured, but we knew the people of Israel would carry on and win this war.

We visited, among other sites, Canada Centre in Metulla – financed by Canadian federations – with its Olympic skating rink; the hesder yeshiva in Kiryat Shmonah, where young religious men combine army service with Jewish learning; and Massuah, the centre for Holocaust studies. We heard from politicians, journalists and analysts. We met enthusiastic and hopeful olim from Ethiopia and Argentina. We learned the true meaning of courage from rescue workers who put their lives on the line to prevent terrorist attacks and treat their victims when they occur. And we travelled to neighbourhoods at risk – Efrat and Gilo.

Israel is an amazing and beautiful country, which Canadians should not be afraid to visit. Our mission faced no threats or dangers. Our brothers and sisters there need to know that we are with them as they fight for our homeland. They want us to come and are thankful when we do. They cannot carry on alone.

To quote the Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, "Israel is strong. We need your participation, your solidarity and your visits."

Tikkun Olam 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began our look at tikkun olam, the Jewish concept of helping to repair the world. Today, we'll look at how people have fulfilled this mitzvah through acts of kindness.

One note before I start: thankfully, there are far too many wonderful programs and initiatives run by federations, synagogues and individuals to be mentioned in one article. My apologies if I have not mentioned yours.

If you want to find a Web site that will inspire you about people's goodness, you don't have to go much further than the Ziv Tzedakah Fund [http://www.ziv.org/]. The fund is basically a clearing house of projects, large and small, that have come to its attention. It distributes money and seeks out new "mitzvah heroes" to support, such as Rabbanit Kapach, the "wedding dress lady" of Jerusalem who provides gowns to brides who are too poor to buy their own. Or John Beltzer, founder of Songs of Love, who along with songwriters and musicians record personalized songs for children who are critically ill. Or Robin Moose and Beth Huber who work at Stanly Manor nursing home in North Carolina. Every year their group travels to the beach and teams up with a local motorbike group and shows that life in a nursing home can be exciting and fun. Ziv also maintains an office in Canada [http://www.feduja.org/commserv/organize/1129.stm].

Ziv Tzedakah Fund founder Danny Siegel is profiled on Philadelphia's Jewish Outreach Partnership Tikkun Olam page. There are also essays by Rabbi Neal Gold, who writes about how rewarding it was to set up a soup kitchen at Hebrew Union College in New York, and Rabbi Amy Eilberg, who writes about bikkur cholim, visiting the sick:

"The visitor's presence in the room communicates the knowledge that illness and pain are part of life, that we will all walk this path, we will all know illness, we will all someday die. Right now, it is the visitor's turn to be whole, vigorous, and strong enough to offer care. Someday this visitor will be ill, vulnerable, in need. The practice of bikkur cholim acts on the deep awareness of our shared vulnerability and leads us to do what we can for others when it is our turn to be strong and well" [http://www.jopp.org/mc/tikun_olam .html].

Many congregations and Jewish federations have noteworthy tikkun olam projects. Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple "Out of the Cold" project provides shelter for the homeless one night a week during the long winter months. Initially, there were safety concerns, but years later, the program is thriving [http://www.rac.org/social/cold.html] and is the recipient of the Reform Movement's Irving J. Fain Social Action Award [http://www.rac.org/social/fain.html].

Do we need a pagan foreign policy?

Warrior Politics*, Robert D. Kaplan, Random House, 2001.

How are democratic nations to live and prosper in the post-World Trade Center era? How can they best defend themselves against mindless terror and fanaticism?

Robert D. Kaplan, author of such best-selling books on foreign affairs and travel as Balkan Ghosts, The Ends of the Earth and Eastward to Tartary, advocates a new kind of leadership that is both visionary and ruthlessly strategic. It demands what he calls "pagan ethics."

He maintains that in the past, vast oceans gave Americans the protection necessary to advance universalist principles. "But in an increasingly smaller world, in which the Middle East and sub-Saharan Africa are as close to us in military terms as Prussia was to Ottoman Turkey, the room for miscalculation must diminish."

For the author, the bedrock of a sound foreign policy should be "comprehensive pragmatism" rather than "utopian hopes." The time has come to forsake religious ideals and the Judeo-Christian ethic in dealing with the harsh international problems of today.

What are included in Kaplan's practical approach to stark reality are an old-fashioned sense of national patriotism, an "evolution of religious virtue to secular self-interest, and a frank acknowledgement that international relations are governed by different moral principles than domestic politics."

He points out that in 1988, during the first Palestinian intifadah, Israel's then-defence minister, Yitzhak Rabin, reportedly told Israeli soldiers to "go in and break their bones," referring to Palestinian protesters. Less violent means had failed to quell the demonstrators, while the use of live bullets resulted in Palestinian casualties that ignited further riots. Rabin, assassinated by a right-wing extremist in 1995, is now a hero for liberal humanists the world over, Kaplan writes.

"Rabin's tough tactics gave him the credibility to make peace… He turned his reputation for brutality to the benefit of his fellow citizens." One surmises that the author would approve of the policies of current Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in dealing with Palestinian terrorists.

Americans should realize that despite their anti-imperial traditions, and despite the fact that imperialism is delegitimized in public discourse, an imperial reality already dominates American foreign policy. "What are the NATO missions in Bosnia and Kosovo other than imperial protectorates, with which the Romans and Habsburgs would have been familiar."

Leaders, he insists, must be insulated from the assaults of a powerful multimedia press and should practice a necessary degree of deception, as Franklin D. Roosevelt did in piloting the Lend-Lease Act through a reluctant American Congress.

To bolster his thesis, Kaplan quotes from a variety of sages and philosophers including Thucydides, Thomas Hobbes, and Sun-Tzu. He reminds us that Machiavelli defines a policy not by its excellence, but by its outcome. Livy shows that the vigour to confront adversaries must ultimately come from pride in past achievements.

As America girds itself for a new kind of war, this shrewd and provocative book offers a mode of behaviour that many will find distasteful. Questions abound. In order for the modern state to survive and prosper, must it forsake its democratic foundations? Is a powerful American imperium inevitable in the face of international terror? Are suspiciously convenient maxims from the past appropriate to the modern situation?

If nothing else, this timely and incisive work will stimulate discussion about how to overcome implacable enemies who don't "play fair" as they seek our destruction.

Olmert favors military option to end uprising

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel is capable of militarily crushing the current Palestinian uprising, claims an Israeli government advisor and former director of Israel's Government Press Office.

"I expect the Israeli military to get a proper order from the government and put an end to it," Yossi Olmert said in an interview. He was here last week to speak to Canadian Jewish Congress and Israel Now, a group of community organizations under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel.

"We should take more decisive action. This is a war. (Prime Minister Ariel) Sharon has done a great deal, but he should do even more. He should update and modify his plan."

Olmert, a Likud party member whose brother is mayor of Jerusalem, suggested a military solution is feasible. "Those who say there isn't are wrong, and are prolonging the conflict."

Olmert pointed out that Israel successfully used military means to force PLO head Yasser Arafat out of Beirut during the 1982 war in Lebanon.

Olmert said he is not calling for Arafat's ouster from the Palestinian autonomous areas in the West Bank and Gaza."Right now, I would say no. But it depends on developments."

Nor should the Palestinian Authority be toppled, "unless you know what'll happen a day after."

The situation in the territories could become infinitely worse if Palestinian areas slip into chaos and are seized by opposing warlords.

Olmert does not advocate the reoccupation of Area A, which is under the full control of the Palestinian Authority.

"We don't need to take over the territories. We know where the bases of violence and terror are. We should go after them. We should renegotiate the situation."

Olmert advised Israel to target the leadership of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, which have claimed responsibility for virtually every suicide bombing since 1994. "They're after us, and we should go after them."

Yossi Olmert

Commending Sharon for refusing to negotiate under fire while the intifadah rages, Olmert said, "That's what we did after the 1993 Oslo accord. That is the mistake we should not repeat again."

Olmert said he opposed the Oslo agreement precisely because he feared the Palestinians would resort to violence to extract political concessions from Israel.

Sharon, he declared, should demand more than seven days of absolute calm before Israel honours the Mitchell recommendations.

Released last spring, the Mitchell report calls for an unconditional ceasefire, as well as cooling-off and normalization periods and a resumption of bilateral talks, which were broken off after the Palestinian uprising.

Taking issue with Sharon's recent assertion that Arafat is "irrelevant," Olmert said, "Arafat is relevant. He's the commander of Palestinian terrorism and violence."

Hamas and Islamic Jihad, Olmert said, serve as Arafat's "sub-contractors" of terrorism.

Olmert said he no longer believes Arafat accepts Israel's existence within its 1948 borders.

"Since the (July 2000) Camp David summit, I've come to the conclusion he wants to do away with Israel. He believes time is on his side."

He was asked whether the Israeli government should seriously consider a Saudi proposal, not yet formally unveiled, under which Arab League nations would normalize relations with Israel in exchange for a withdrawal to the pre-1967 armistice lines.

"Once the violence is over, we can discuss it. Peace is desirable and should be pursued, but not at any cost."

Israel, he noted, should not have to pay a territorial price for Arab recognition.

In talks with the Arabs, Israel should be careful not to cross several red lines, Olmert said.

- Israel should not return to the borders that existed before the Six Day War.
- Israel should not even discuss the 1947 United Nations partition scheme, or the Palestinian demand that Arab refugees be allowed back into what is now Israel.
- Israel should not offer the kind of concessions on Jerusalem and the Jordan Valley that Ehud Barak, the former prime minister, offered at Camp David and Taba.

Taking a swipe at Saudi Arabia's peace plan, Olmert said it was inspired by a desire to appease public opinion in the United States in the wake of Sept. 11.

Turning to another topic, he warned that Hezbollah is trying – so far without success due to Israeli, American and Syrian pressure – to open a new front on Israel's northern border. Hezbollah, however, may try to infiltrate Israel through Jordan.

Olmert has no regrets about Israel's unilateral pullout from its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon in May 2000. "I was one of the first Likudniks to call for it."

But the circumstances of the withdrawal were taken by the Arabs as a sign of Israeli weakness, he said.

Olmert does not believe that Israel and Syria will resume bilateral talks any time soon.

"It's not in the cards, and it's not in our interest. The Golan border is quiet, and [Bashar] Assad [Syria's president] is still engaged in consolidating his domestic authority in Syria."

Olmert, born in Binyamina, Israel in 1950, directed Israel's Government Press Office from 1989 to 1992, during Yitzhak Shamir's term as prime minister.

He was also Moshe Arens' advisor when the latter was defence minister.

A graduate of the Hebrew University and the London School of Economics, Olmert currently lectures at Bar-Ilan University, writes for Israeli newspapers and advises Rabbi Michael Melchior, the deputy foreign minister.

Jewish, Muslim, Christian leaders open dialogue

By PABLO FUCHS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish, Christian and Muslim leaders came together recently to discuss their respective views of God and to open dialogue between the three communities.

The discussion, organized by the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto and held at the city's historic St. Anne's Anglican Church, marked the first time the group welcomed a Muslim leader to share Islam's views on topics such as God, terrorism and religious co-operation.

Imam Shabir Ally, president of the Islamic Information and Dawah Centre in Toronto, said people can only reach understanding through dialogue.

"Human beings are so similar that it would be a travesty to concentrate solely on our differences," he said.

The Jewish representative at the discussion, Rabbi Sol Tanenzapf of Beit Rayim Congregation in Richmond Hill, agreed: "There's no guarantee that we'll change the world by doing this," he said. "But we must do our part, and that's through having discussions like this and emphasizing our common humanity and aspirations."

Joined by Rev. Victor Shepherd of the Streetsville United Church and a philosophy and historical theology professor at Tyndale College and Seminary in Toronto, the three men discussed God and how the views reflected within their respective religions are for the good of all humankind.

Rabbi Tanenzapf, who spoke first because Judaism was the first of the three major monotheistic religions to appear on earth, discussed the ethical teachings of his religion and how, through the Jewish people, God provided an ethical, moral ground for living.

"If God cares about the weak in society, as we have learned from the Hebrew bible, so too must people," he said. "God's righteousness is the standard for human justice, and he teaches not to oppress strangers and to treat people lower than us with compassion."

Rev. Shepherd discussed the events of Sept. 11 and God in the context of that day's events. "For me, evil makes God not less, but more believable," he said. "Sept. 11 magnified God's heartbreak over us, his patience, his persistence, and his faithfulness to his covenant with Abraham."

In his discussion about Abraham, Imam Ally emphasized the common link between the three faiths and how each tries to demonstrate a total love and respect for God.

"When God commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son, he wasn't telling us that he wants what we possess, he's the one that has given it to us in the first place," said Imam Ally. "What he did is something that he continues to do today. He asks us if we would be willing to give up something we love to serve him."

In their talks, the clergymen also spoke of the need to respect each other's beliefs and agreed that it's only through dialogue that inroads can be made between the communities.

"There are different paths to God and salvation," said Rabbi Tanenzapf. "And exclusivist claims are hard to defend if one comes to terms with the depth of wisdom of other religions and the depth of character of its followers."

"All human beings have a part to do whatever is within their power to make this planet safe and enjoyable for themselves and everyone else," Imam Ally said.

After the clergymen spoke, a Christian audience member asked Imam Ally what Islam preaches in regard to events such as the Sept. 11 attacks. He responded that the tragic events of that day broke three major laws of Islam: one, don't kill non-combatants (civilians); two, suicide is non-permissible; and three, provocation of war is not allowed.

Passover food drive launched

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section, has kicked off its 19th annual Passover Food Drive.

The drive, supported by Mazon Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress, assists more than 10,000 recipients by supplying essentials necessary for the week of Passover and the seder meal.

Food boxes include juice, wine, chicken, Passover non-perishables, as well as candles and a Haggadah.

The drive was started by women who wanted to help immigrants, said Terry Winston, executive director NCJW, Toronto, but it has grown and evolved to meet the needs of the entire community.

Last year, the organization provided food for the seder run by Ve'ahavta – Canadian Jewish Human and Relief Committee – for the homeless, the hungry and those with nowhere to go.

Avrum Rosensweig, founder and executive vice-president of Ve'ahavta, said about 100 people attended last year's seder and there was "plenty of food."

He said one girl who lived on the street told him it had been her first seder in years. "We helped her share in the holiday.

"Another woman asked us for help in locating an apartment in a Jewish area and we were able to help her."

Rosensweig said about 12 Buddhist monks also attended the seder. "It is a good opportunity to show the community what we are all about. It breaks down the stereotypes and helps cut down anti-Semitism."

Winston said NCJW also provides boxes for seniors, the infirm, some students and anyone in need. "We send out a letter to agencies such as Jewish Family & Child Service, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, Circle of Care and the Reena Foundation, as well as UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and rabbis across the city. We list our criteria and they send us a list of recipients."

Although the organization is always looking for donations of kosher-for-Passover food, it can also use cash donations because it's able to buy food at wholesale prices.

"The community has always been wonderful in helping us out. Every year as the cost of food goes up, the list of recipients goes up. If we have cash donations we can buy exactly what people need," Winston said.

Donated food is never wasted, she said. Any leftovers go to the North York Harvest food bank or the inter-synagogue food banks.

NCJW is always looking for volunteers, Winston said.

For details, call 416-633-5100.

Yiddish speakers angered

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — Jewish Public Library officials say its Yiddish books will return to the shelves after they had been moved to boxes in the basement to make way for a Holocaust collection.

Library president Jerry Klasner, responding to complaints from members of the Bernard Betel Centre's Yiddish cultural club, would not specify a date for the books' return, but called it "a high priority."

In the meantime, Yiddish books are available the day after being requested by title, which Klasner described as a "minor inconvenience."

The library always intended to return the books to the stacks, he said. "I don't want anyone to think that we are getting rid of them."

Rabbi Irwin Witty, director of the Albert and Temmy Latner JPL, said a solution is being worked out, though he would not give details.

Rabbi Witty said the addition of the Holocaust books after the library's recent merger with the Holocaust Centre of Toronto has given the JPL an extensive collection of Holocaust material, perhaps the most complete in Canada.

Yiddish club member Leon Zarek said receiving books a day after they are requested is not good enough.

"This is not what a library is for," said Zarek. "We should be able to browse among Yiddish books on the shelves. It's a shame that a city with a large Jewish population like Toronto has no Yiddish library."

The library has received about a dozen complaints about the lack of shelf space for Yiddish books, Rabbi Witty said.

Zarek said 40 members of the Yiddish cultural club wrote a letter to UJA Federation in Yiddish last September complaining about what they contend is the federation's lack of support for the library, but received no reply.

Ed Segalowitz, the federation's vice-president for community planning, said the charge that the JPL does not have the money to shelve Yiddish books because UJA Federation does not sufficiently fund the library is unjustified. Federation gives the JPL $129,000 each year, Segalowitz said.

Looking for an interim solution, Rabbi Witty said he was rebuffed when he offered to send up to 80 Yiddish books to the Betel Centre each time the Yiddish club meets.

"Their attitude was that I was making fun of them and that they would have already read any books that I sent," Rabbi Witty said. "My answer was that I would send books that they have not read."

Campaign 2002 results are 'unprecedented' war, he said in his 15-minute address. "The lives of Israelis are on the line every day and night."

Arens delivered an analysis of the current situation in Israel, concluding that Israel can overcome Palestinian terror attacks only through military means.

"The challenge facing us today is keeping Israel strong," he said. "A strong Israel will make it possible to live in peace and security."

Campaign vice-chairs Harvey Naglie and Carole Sterling, along with Jeff Cohen, co-chair of the volunteer development committee, presented the following volunteer awards.

Arens favours military means to end conflict

• Rookie of the Year Award to Blayne Lastman, co-chair of goods and services, who raised $63,000, with an average donation increase of 163 per cent;

• Pomegranate Award to Ruth Ekstein and Susan Gudofsky of Women's Campaign & Advocacy, which raised more than $5.4 million, approximately $500,000 more than last year.

An additional award was given to campaign associate Jennifer Cohen, the staff member deemed to have had the most direct impact on volunteer success.

There were more than 1,000 volunteers in all, Sterling said.

Next year's campaign chairs will be Ronnie Appleby and Howard Sokolowski. Hinda Silber will succeed Lesley Binstock Offman as Women's Campaign & Advocacy Chair.

For the Creative Homemaker, THE GENERAL STORE is a dream come true

Once in a blue moon, a unique, imaginative new merchandising concept comes to town. This is what you'll find at the Thornhill location of The General Store. The bright, cheery colours will enchant you as you step through the wide entrance, to browse through this intriguing, maze-like setting.

The General Store brings to the city the ambience of small-town shopping: a village of boutiques in the heart of the Promenade. It offers an unprecedented variety of handcrafted, one-of-a-kind gifts and collectibles. To see anything like this, you'd have to visit a thousand boutiques.

There's a feeling here that you don't usually associate with a big, 4,500-square-foot store. The 120 booths, together in an easily accessible space, represent boutiques, crafters, manufacturers, importers and wholesalers around the world. It's like a trade fair -- or streets of specialty shops under one roof.

The General Store offers an array of eclectic objets d'art from Kenya, Thailand, Scotland, and a thousand other places: everything from Southwestern Native American-style pottery and wall hangings, to wood and metal handicrafts from Indonesia, or East and West Indian carvings. There are over 20,000 articles in all.

Are you a creative homemaker, looking to beautify your home? The General Store is a dream come true, with something for every taste. Browse through unique decor accents and artistic finds ranging from pillows and table runners, to country afghans and wall hangings, to dried flowers and floral arrangements.

Would you like to enrich the quality of your home lighting? There are ceramic and Tiffany lamps, as well as glass and crystal candle holders and frames; there's handmade lead crystal, and stained glass. Even glass bowls and vases such as you see here, will enhance the way light reflects in a room.

Are you looking for housewarming gifts? There are switch plates, with themes such as flowers or fruit. For kitchen and dining room, there are platters, decorative plates, place mats, napkins, candelabra, and silverware with coloured glass inlay. An entire section is devoted to candles in many scents and designs.

There's something for every space, indoors or out. For a kid's room, for example, there are babies' sleepers with sports themes like hockey, or Noah's Ark. And there are sundials, stepping stones, cherubs, gargoyles, animal ornaments, and statues for outdoor places like your garden or porch.

Are you looking for a special keepsake, a gift for a special friend? There are photo albums, pewter frames, mugs and candle sets. Or how about a crystal chess set?

There are things for the office, too, to make it more personal. You'll find solid marble desk sets, clocks, paperweights and silver pen sets.

You'll see paintings in every style, abstract or representational; there are sculptures in every style, and every possible material from glass to metal. They represent craft traditions from around the world, from Native North American to African.

Would you like to support Canadian and Native artists? They're well represented. From Inuit artists, for example, there are hundreds of carvings, paintings and drawings.

Then there are personal items like aromatherapy, as well as handmade soaps and bath oils. There are wearable accessories like scarves, leather purses and hats.

Do you enjoy an antique, nostalgic look? There is memorabilia such as kerosene lamps, old movie posters and John Deere collectibles.

There are even delectations to nosh on. You'll find seasonings, sauces and boxes of fragrant teas; the sweets include maple syrup, popcorn in many flavours, bubble gum in dispensers, homemade brownies, chocolates and jams. And The General Store will put together gift baskets.

The atmosphere is relaxed, so take your time to browse; no one will look over your shoulder or hurry you along. At the same time, The General Store's helpful, knowledgeable staff are there to answer your questions when you need them. You pay for all your purchases, whether one or 20, at a single cash desk.

The Promenade store in Thornhill is the newest General Store location. You'll find it on the lower level of The Promenade (1 Promenade Circle, Unit 1016C) near Sears, opposite The Bank Of Montreal; phone 905-762-1844.

The General Store has 17 locations across Canada, with several others in the GTA area, in Markham, Richmond Hill, Pickering, Etobicoke and Brampton.

RAWHIDE

WE ARE THE MANUFACTURER

GENUINE BRAND RAWHIDE QUALITY LEATHER FURNITURE

10th ANNIVERSARY SALE

Rawhide International Inc. is celebrating its 10th year anniversary.

Established in 1992, Brian Green, president of Rawhide International, opened his leather furniture manufacturing plant to specifically deal with the public's individual needs.

By dealing with the public directly, customers can not only choose the style and colour that suits their individual tastes or home decor, they can even customize each piece if they so desire.

For example, if a customer likes a certain style of sofa but prefers the arm or back styling from another one, we will customize it to how they want it. Green says, "We'll meet any measurement, within reason, since we also manufacture our own hardwood frames."

At Rawhide we pride ourselves on using only the best quality materials and long lasting construction methods. Green elaborated, "Our leather furniture will stand up to a lifetime of regular use and still look great. That's why we offer one of the best warranties in the business."

An interesting tour through their manufacturing plant reveals that there are no great secrets behind Green's philosophy for making fine leather furniture.

To this end, for example, all the leather used by Rawhide International is hand selected from top grade and full grade European hides. Frames are constructed on the premises from solid hardwoods which allow Rawhide to customize one's piece if so desired. Back & arm cushions are zipped to make them easy to remove for cleaning; all cushions are cut from full panels for greater durability.

To ensure years of comfort, Rawhide utilizes a coil spring suspension that's warranted for a lifetime of normal use. High density foam, which holds its shape is used throughout.

All the leather is double baseball stitched for extra strength and added durability.

"We take such great pride in the superior construction and quality we build into every piece we make", says Green.

"Our best customers are the ones who do their homework and understand the relationship between quality & value."

Green says, "After all, value is decided by how much quality you get for the dollars you spend. At Rawhide, what we offer is exceptional value."

Before you start shopping for leather furniture, Green invites you to come to Rawhide or visit them on their website at www.rawhideinternational.com and learn how great quality furniture is made. Then, he says you can shop with confidence as an educated consumer, knowing you're going to make an informed buying decision.

When it comes to home comfort, it's never too early to think ahead. Right now, staying warm is a priority but before you know it, you'll be thinking about beating the heat with air conditioning.

McKinnon has decades of experience. Originally, McKinnon delivered coal to its customers in the 30's and over the years became a major fuel oil supplier to many households in the greater Toronto area. Today, McKinnon installs and services natural gas heating equipment as well as central air conditioning systems.

McKinnon has built its reputation on friendly, personalized service. In the last ten years, McKinnon has installed approximately 20,000 systems. Clearing the way to Value

Buying windows for your home is never an easy decision to make; if not for the cost there are choices of styles. Should you go with traditional sliders, contemporary hung systems or casements? How thick should the glass be? Should you choose grills, colour or both? And who can you trust to enter your home and treat it with respect?

At the best of times these are not easy choices to make. At the worst of times, why bother? The answer is because you have a need; insulate your home and preserve its value.

Another important question is "why choose vinyl over other window materials?" To begin with, vinyl windows are low maintenance. Wiping vinyl with a soft cloth and without the use of abrasive cleansers is all you need to do. Secondly, efficient and well-engineered vinyl windows will outlast most other window materials on the market. Aesthetically, they are clean and simple; you never have to paint them. Practically, well-engineered vinyl profiles are a fantastic insulating material.

So why choose an EMPIRE 2000 window? We base the answer on the three W's; weight, width and wear. The weight of our profiles matches or exceeds any top-name manufacturer in the industry. The width of our profiles ensures the window's strength and insulating value. The wear of our profiles means that we warranty every window, in writing, for life!

At EMPIRE 2000 Mfg. Inc. we have ten years of continuous successes in manufacturing and installing vinyl window systems. We focus on residential renovations and have a successful history in apartment restorations.

Our manufacturing uses state-of-the-art technology. Our installers are trained professionals. Our customer service is next to none. We listen, we look, and we estimate every job fairly based on your preferences.

So give us a call when you're ready to make a change. Our staff is available to answer questions and free quotations are available. At EMPIRE 2000 we believe that quality windows will not only enhance the value of your home but will also provide you with years of convenience and comfort. In this regard, EMPIRE 2000 is simply the clear advantage.

One Glen Park luxury condos now under construction

Those who enjoy comfort, spaciousness and a carefree lifestyle should make One Glen Park — located at the southwest corner of Bathurst and Glen Park — their new home.

This project is part of Camrost-Felcorp's exclusive Signature Collection of condominium residences. In the past 25 years, Camrost-Felcorp has built in excess of 6,000 residential units. One Glen Park is the latest in a long line of design successes. For President David Feldman, it represents the fruition of an ambitious goal: to create a detached home environment in condominium form. As Community Sales Manager Barbara Klein notes, you could call these residences "houses in condo's clothing". Feldman and his design team have created a development that embodies everything a condo can and should be. In other words, a residence without compromise.

With construction proceeding rapidly (the ground floor is well under way), purchasers are scheduled to move into their new home before the end of 2002. And what a home! This jewel of a project, set among million-dollar single-family homes in this highly desirable neighbourhood, sets a new standard of excellence in condominium construction.

You're moving out of a house and into a condo for convenience: simple, uncomplicated living, without the tsuris of maintaining a house and yard. You want the lifestyle that lets you devote your time and energy to the things you've yearned to do for decades.

Construction proceeding rapidly for 2002 occupancy

One Glen Park offers you this, and a great deal more. Like living in a friendly area where you know your neighbours. Like enjoying all the advantages and convenience of the condominium lifestyle while remaining connected to all your old haunts. Like being within walking distance of shuls and shopping, family and friends.

There are some 43 condominium residences in the richly-appointed seven-storey building. There are a variety of designs available. The seventh floor has four penthouses, for example; each boasts a terrace as large as some entire condominiums!

Not only have One Glen Park's builders maintained the standards of fine design and craftsmanship that go with gracious living, each resident's needs will receive special consideration. This is not just a condominium, it's your home, and Barbara will be happy to spend as much time as necessary to ensure that it fulfills that vision.

The porte cochère provides a grand entrance for you, your guests, friends, and family. It is complemented by a distinguished, richly appointed lobby with a gracious, warmly welcoming fireplace.

Each condominium unit has a nine-foot ceiling, and there are pot lights in the kitchens and bathrooms. Brightness and generous spaces are the rule here.

There are five high-end appliances, and the kitchens have granite counters with undermount sinks. Whether you wish to enjoy a casual meal, or display your culinary flair at a dinner party, One Glen Park will give you what you've always wanted: a gourmet kitchen in your own home! Speaking of guests, the larger residences are spacious enough that if you feel like having 20 people for Shabbos dinner, there's ample room.

20 guests for Shabbos dinner no problem at One Glen Park

Your every comfort is provided for. You control your own individual heating and cooling environment. Some ensuite bathrooms even have whirlpools, double vanities, separate showers, and marble tile floors.

Want to keep in sync with the world around you? Every residence has provision for a high-speed Rogers Wave link, so you can surf the Web at your leisure.

There are an abundance of facilities for you and your visitors: two guest suites, a party room, and a kitchenette for catering. Thinking about athletics, or a healthy, physically active lifestyle? You'll find a steam room, a fitness centre, even a wave pool for aspiring Olympians.

Prices at One Glen Park — extremely competitive for such a high-end property — range from $286,800 to $980,000. Consequently, sales have been so successful that some two-thirds of the residences have now been sold. You're therefore advised to act soon to ensure you get the floor, suite and design you want.

Luxury. Convenience. Competitive pricing. One Glen Park is a truly inspired masterpiece of fine design, craftsmanship and gracious living that is sure to endure the test of time.

Students should expand their horizons: educator

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Students who choose their university major only because they want to enter a certain profession or get good marks may be painting themselves into an academic corner if they don't get into that program, warns educational consultant Judy Libman.

"If you're looking for one feature of a university, try to find one that encourages students to take a mix [of courses] in their first year," Libman said in a lecture sponsored by the sisterhood of Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Last year, Libman left York University – where she had been director of student development for the Faculty of Pure and Applied Sciences – to devote herself full-time to her consulting business, Ambitions Educational Consulting. She attributes the volume of inquiries she receives, in part, to a decreased availability of advice for students, both at the high school and university levels.

The result is that students turn to each other for advice. Sometimes students are quicker to pick up on things than the university, she said, but sometimes they're simply wrong. "As an example, lots of students will tell each other you have to go to a university that has a medical school, to be able to go to a medical school. This sort of narishkeit [foolishness] gets passed around with the authority of truth."

Often, young people don't interact with anyone other than their friends, she said. "You want to help them see other perspectives," she told parents. "It's enormously important to help them get comfortable with the idea of relating to adults in school and in the workplace, specifically around the idea of mentoring. The kids who really get it, and make it, have had somebody get to know them, or take an interest in them and mentor them."

It's important for students to take at least one small course every year, so they can get to know a professor, she said. From a pragmatic standpoint, students may need letters of reference, she added.

Other ideas include becoming involved in a committee or otherwise becoming "engaged with" the university. Don't avoid opportunities, Libman advised.

She is also big on networking. "When students want to find out about a particular career, you can help them by saying, 'You remember Auntie Ellen's neighbour at the cottage. Do you know that she does that? Why don't you give her a call?' "

Another way for students to broaden their horizons is to read the newspaper, specifically the op-ed pages – not just the news, she said. "Talk about it over the dinner table."

It's also important for parents and their children to have a good rapport and clear communication around career issues, Libman said. Sometimes parents unintentionally send signals that are misinterpreted. Typically, a parent might say – conversationally – that a cousin is in medical school and seems to enjoy it. "You're just trying to keep the conversation going, and they hear, 'Oh-oh, I have to be a doctor.' "

Students have to choose majors way too early, Libman believes. As early as Grade 9, she said, students are choosing courses based on perceived difficulty, and whether or not they like the particular teacher. "Students who think they're interested in sciences will try to take nothing but sciences and maths, and students who have a bad experience will never take it."

In her experience, students often aren't aware of, or don't even consider, more than half a dozen career choices. "In my view, choosing a career before you start university is like choosing a caterer for the wedding before you have the first date."

First year, Libman believes, should be a time to broaden horizons and check out options.

Because of the double cohort year – in which the OAC year is being discontinued, meaning that current Grade 11 students in Ontario will be finishing high school along with students who are now in Grade 12 – students may no longer be able to count on being accepted at a particular university or into a particular program, said Libman.

Although government funding has enabled universities to add new buildings, funding for "faculty renewal" (replacement of retiring faculty members) is targeted to specific areas such as computer science and biotechnology, but not liberal arts or fine arts, she said.

She does not believe that students' delaying university for a year will solve the problem.

Other advice for parents of university or pre-university or college students included:

• Recognize that their career world is going to be very different from ours. Make it a joint learning process to find out about options – information should flow both ways.

• For students using tutors, the tutors should teach them independent thinking and insight, not simply getting the right answer this time.

• Don't let students work too many hours. Research shows that more than 10 hours a week of work in university will lower their marks.

• Help them know that everything isn't life-or-death, and that marks aren't everything. Encourage them to view competition as competition with themselves to achieve their personal best, rather than as competition with others. It's much healthier.

New pro-Israel paper planned at U of T

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new student newspaper under the auspices of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) is raising controversy, and the first issue hasn't even been printed yet.

An editorial in the Feb. 25 issue of the University of Toronto student newspaper, the Varsity, questions the "utility" of CounterPoint, a pro-Israel paper whose first issue is expected to be published in the next few weeks.

How long before there is a pro-Palestinian newspaper to counter Counterpoint, asks the Varsity. "And with each side firing salvos at each other from closed communities ensconced in newsprint, what hope of real debate is there?"

The Varsity and its "anti-Israel bias," according to a Feb. 7 article in the Charlatan – its counterpart at Carleton University – was the catalyst for U of T student Benjamin Matta, 21, to start Counterpoint.

Not so, said Matta, a third-year Human Biology student and Counterpoint's editor-in-chief, in an interview last week. Yes, there have been "problems" at U of T, but there are problems all over, he said.

When he returned to Toronto last year after a year of study at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Matta was unprepared for "all the rhetoric I saw in student papers and pamphlets people were handing out at schools saying that Israel doesn't have a right to exist, and that Zionism is racism. Also, in the mass media, I noticed subtle things that make the situation seem different than it is."

Actually, said Matta, he thinks the Varsity is "doing a good job overall."

Stuart Lapowich, Israel Affairs Co-ordinator for JCS, believes the Varsity is not balanced in terms of space given to each side of the issues regarding the Middle East conflict, but said that could be due in part to a dearth of pro-Israel articles being written for them.

In any event, both Lapowich and Matta agree that Counterpoint has a role to play, and not just in the Jewish community.

Matta and some of his fellow students, who now serve on his editorial board, had thought of starting a pro-Israel paper. When they approached Lapowich, they discovered he had similar ideas.

"I wanted to get the truth out, as I see it," said Matta. The target audience is not just Jewish students, although he hopes it will help Jewish students who feel intimidated by anti-Israel challengers and think they have nothing to say. "I want to give them the confidence and knowledge to know what's going on and to be able to say something."

For non-Jewish readers, Matta expects CounterPoint will provide a broader context. He hopes it will be available for public distribution at approximately a dozen universities. Approval is pending, once the first issue is available for examination.

"We are committed to including a wide range of opinions," said Matta of the student-written publication. An interview with a representative of the Arab Students Association at U of T, for example, is set to run in the first issue, he said. Another article will address the United Nations' treatment of Israel.

CounterPoint is being funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's communication department, and approximately 12,000 copies are expected to be printed. Matta is hoping for quarterly publication.

Book addresses non-academic issues

TORONTO — Of the 10 chapters in a new book for parents of university-bound students, only one is specifically devoted to academic concerns.

Some of the other issues affecting choice of school are spelled out or hinted at in the title A Parent's Guide to Sex, Drugs and Flunking Out: Answers to the Questions Your College Student Doesn't Want You to Ask, by Joel Epstein (Hazelden Publishing).

The author is a Massachusetts-based former director of special projects and senior attorney for the U.S. Department of Education's Higher Education Center for Alcohol and Other Drug Prevention.

Although the book is American-oriented, it offers enough practical, generic information – including safety tips, health-related information and suggestions for what to bring when moving into a dorm – that parents and students here can also benefit.

The suggestion to check out school newspapers is one example. "What alcohol or drug-related messages are expressed in the ads, articles, editorials or letters to the editor?"

More food for thought:

• In what sort of environment do I thrive? Will I feel comfortable at this school?

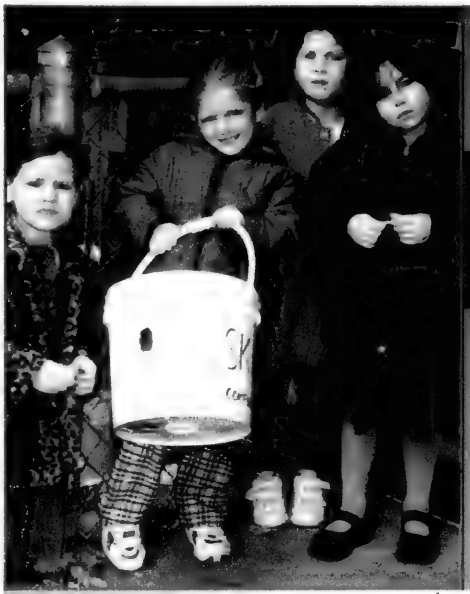
A Web site mentioned in the book, www.hadenough.org, includes disturbing student stories about alcohol and campus life. It indicates that in the United States, 95 per cent of violent crime on campus is alcohol related.

Although he doesn't mention Judaism per se in the section on diversity and housing considerations, Epstein briefly addresses the role of diet and religious beliefs in choosing housing and roommates.

In a section on faith issues, he advises parents whose college-age students become more religiously observant – or less – that "learning to let go in the spiritual realm may be just as important as in other aspects of your son's or daughter's life."

He also devotes a two-page section to sexual orientation, noting that gay student life on campus is "thriving and here to stay." For some students whose family members don't accept their homosexuality, the campus may represent a "protected place," he writes. He notes, however, that discrimination and hate crimes are among the issues facing gay and lesbian students, and ultimately their parents.

The book concludes with a resource list of publications and Web sites. – F.K.



LIVE & LEARN

Challenges

Anyone involved in the world of Jewish or secular education in recent years has seen many changes unfold. This supplement will examine some of these changes from different perspectives.

Students have begun to feel the effects of a more rigorous general studies curriculum at the same time as administrators have had to cope with the pressures of a teacher shortage.

Some schools have taken steps to address the needs of students in a variety of ways, but educators and administrators point to a lot more that needs to be done.

As Jewish day school parents look forward to the financial relief of tax credits, accountability to ministry guidelines is being debated by some provincial political leaders.

In the supplementary education arena, adult learning programs appear to be growing while the number of children registered in Jewish after-school classes is decreasing.

And although subsidies are available to families in need, the challenge of making Jewish education affordable and accessible to the middle class is becoming a real concern as the cost of programs and resources soar.

These are just a few of the changes that will leave their mark on the students currently working their way through the system, and will influence who they will become as adults.

Of course, our children are also very much affected by their home lives and the environment in which they grow.

With Passover just around the corner, many of us have begun to prepare our homes for the holiday.

As I begin my plans for the cleaning and cooking, my mind turns to the seder table where we will sit down as parents and role models and teach our children about their history.

And I remember that the interactive nature of the seder will invite all participants to engage in learning, regardless of their personalities or educational styles.

From generation to generation, the Haggadah has taught us that each child must sit at the table and help tell the story of his or her Jewish heritage.

I believe that we are also compelled to ensure that every child has the opportunity to sit at a well-stocked education table, no matter how challenging the times.

Desperately seeking qualified teachers

The following four articles represent a summary of discussions between* The CJN *and many of Toronto's Jewish day and supplementary school principals.

Some of the issues raised by the principals were then discussed at a roundtable at York University's Centre for Jewish Studies. Participants included Seymour Epstein, executive director of the Board of Jewish Education; Prof. Alex Pomson, co-ordinator of York University's Jewish Teacher Education Program; and Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services.

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Recruiting, training and retaining teachers is currently the most pressing problem facing the Jewish education system.

Experts note that an explosive growth in Jewish day school enrolment coupled with an increased demand for teachers in the public schools has led to a dramatic shortage in the supply of educators in Jewish schools.

In the United States, organizations such as the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education (CAJE) and the AVI CHAI Foundation have adopted resolutions and taken steps to deal with the personnel crisis in Jewish education.

In Toronto, UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education Midrasha l'Morim and York University's Jewish Teacher Education programs are available to train teachers.

In the meantime, the current teacher crisis affects the ability of schools to deal with any other problem, said Lucy Cohen, director of education at United Synagogue Day School.

"Teachers develop skill sets at our schools and then go off to public school jobs for better pensions and easier jobs, sometimes with only two weeks' notice," Cohen said. "And projections from the Ministry of Education and the Ontario College of Teachers suggest this problem will continue over the next decade."

Toronto Heschel School principal Gail Baker said it has become especially important to train teachers to meet new curriculum guidelines.

This is especially challenging without access to the professional development programs that the public schools have, added Sheri Wise, general studies principal at Bnos Bais Yaakov for Girls.

Jewish day schools are further burdened by their need to find teachers in both general and Judaic studies, said Reuven Stern, principal of Netivot HaTorah Jewish Day School.

"We need North American teachers for cultural symmetry and Israeli teachers for their perspectives," he said.

Elyssa Cohen, director of the Downtown Jewish Day School, added that some schools expect their teachers to be well versed in the arts as well.

Paul Shaviv, headmaster of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto said administrators need to face issues relating to the professional training of teachers.

"Many of our teachers are professionally underdeveloped," Shaviv said. "There are Jewish studies teachers in our schools who do not have standard curriculum or textbooks, nor do they have sufficient pedagogical training."

Shaviv also said Jewish day schools should offer tuition discounts for children of teachers in those schools in order to attract and retain educators.

Responding to the teacher shortage:
Salaries and status seen as key issues

Kaye: We see a lot of young people who contemplate coming into the field and while initially they may see Jewish education as desirable career opportunities, there are many factors which cause them to reconsider.

Salaries are very low and expectations are very high. However, the turn in the economy may cause more people to consider Jewish education as an alternative career.

Offering teachers discounted tuitions for their children is certainly an issue worth looking at. When I worked in Australia, anyone working in the Jewish community only had to pay 50 per cent of the Jewish day school tuitions. In Toronto, however, you're dealing with a lot of teachers and this would be a major expense.

Epstein: I'm not sure that we have our finger right on the socio-economic issues. We are seeing more students consider careers in Jewish education today because money is no longer the determining factor for them.

As the Jewish community gets richer, some kids feel that they don't have to earn a real salary – similar to periods in English history when people first felt they had their incomes in place before they took jobs.

The question should be how much the large, well established, wealthy families will suffer in this current economic downturn and how this will affect this current generation of kids who wouldn't be dependent on teachers' salaries for a full income.

These dynamics cut across all sectors of Jewish life – haredi, Orthodox, as well as within the liberal Jewish world.

However, this doesn't necessarily affect the issue of status, which can be just as important a factor as salary.

As far as discounted tuitions go, people are considering this issue right now. Toronto is a strange city because most other communities do have arrangements for teachers. We have to solve this problem for teachers and communal workers. However, with such a large day school population and staff, I don't know how we would find those kinds of resources.

Pomson: Today, recruitment isn't as hard as retention. Toronto in particular has done very well at selling teaching as a career and enhancing its status in the eyes of the community. York University's Jewish Education program has seen a growth of 50 per cent in the number of students, as well as a steady number of graduates from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Teaching requires a certain amount of commitment to a vocation – students come into the profession because they feel they're good working with children and they take pleasure in giving of themselves. However, in the long run, you can only live off vocation for a certain amount of time and then financial issues become more significant.

Meeting the needs of all children

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Meeting the behavioural, social, educational and psychological needs of as many students as possible is a fundamental challenge facing today's Jewish schools.

For teachers and administrators operating under financial constraints, just teaching children the day-to-day curriculum can sometimes be a challenge.

But schools need to find the resources to accept students who do not fit the "mould," said Kathy Manoim, principal of She'arim Hebrew Day School.

Right now, she said, "schools only want students who are low maintenance and do not require extra time or remediation."

Sheri Wise, general studies principal of Bnos Bais Yaakov for Girls, echoes Manoim's sentiments.

"Your heart tells you that you need to provide special programs, but it is financially very difficult," Wise said.

"Families want [their children] in our schools for reasons of commitment and Jewish learning," said Zita Gardner, director of the Leo Baeck Day School.

However, Gardner pointed out, educators are facing increasing demands for many reasons. Problems emanating from divorces, marital tensions or difficulties with parenting all work their way into the classroom.

"Many parents face enormous demands outside the home and cannot always handle the needs of their children," Gardner added.

Manoim said that when parents don't have enough quality time to spend with their kids, it leads to children who are emotionally needy.

In addition, Manoim said "children are stressed due to over-programming, long school days and little time to develop other interests."

Anita Wein, vice-principal of general studies at Toronto Jewish Academy (Ohr Menachem), said class size is an important issue.

"Where classes are large and composed of students of diverse backgrounds and ability, both behaviour and learning are negatively impacted."

Gail Baker, principal of Toronto Heschel School, said educators need to make use of research on the different ways children learn.

Paul Shaviv, headmaster of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and Norman Smith, principal of the Bnei Akiva high schools, pointed to the need to provide opportunities for educationally challenged and non-university bound students.

It's important to change the perception that all Jewish children must go on to academic-oriented professions, Smith said.

"We need to make Jewish education accessible to kids who are currently disenfranchised or non-academic," Shaviv said.

Addressing Student Needs:
Accommodating the greatest number of children

Prof. Alex Pomson, York University: It is to the credit of the principals that they see it as their responsibility to address the needs of the greatest range of children.

Meeting the educational and psychological needs of a broad range of children within each school – an inclusive model – is probably educationally and ethically sounder than providing a separate school model. However, doing so requires a greater level of resources.

Right now, I don't see any easy answers. The current system is already straining to find teachers sufficiently qualified to run regular classrooms. Special needs educators are even harder to find.

On the other hand, it wasn't so long ago that every time a principal had a problem, they would call parents and say, "Your kid can't handle the double load," and the kid was taken out of the system. Principals, schools and public opinion have come a long way since then.

Zac Kaye, Jewish Campus Services: When Jewish day schools do not meet the needs of children, parents are faced with a very difficult decision.

Parents experience a lot of angst trying to reconcile the needs of their children with social pressures that may run counter to their best interests. When peer groups pressure them to stay in a system which may not be best serving the interests of their children, it's important for parents to put the needs of their children – their education and future – in front of what peers are saying.

Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education: This is one area where we have to be careful of absolutes and platitudes. The problem is that you have to see it as a continuum. On one extreme, schools can either meet all children's needs or, at the other pole, maintain a high-level curriculum. Schools are going to find themselves somewhere in the middle or striving towards one end.

These days, there is a strong sentiment in the community for schools to be much more inclusive. However, sometimes a separate school, like She'arim, is needed for those cases that can't be easily mainstreamed.

While the problem has a lot to do with resources, it also requires an attitudinal change. Often, it is the parents of the so-called normal child that complain about special needs children.

Fortunately, things are changing. Twenty years ago you would never have seen camps with programs for developmentally challenged kids. Today Camp Ramah's Tikvah program is celebrating its 10th anniversary.

Maintaining Jewish continuity

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Parents have different expectations from day schools and Jewish curriculum is not always a priority, say many educators.

Yet providing a serious approach to Jewish studies was seen as a primary educational objective for all the principals surveyed by The CJN.

The divide between parent-body expectations and school vision is creating a new tension in the educational environment.

There are a growing number of parents whose commitment to Jewish education may not be the main reason for choosing our schools, said Zita Gardner, director of Leo Baeck Day School.

Uri Korin from Bialik Hebrew Day School pointed out the importance of providing students with intellectual and spiritual "food for the road" in terms of knowledge, values and codes of behaviour that will sustain and enhance their commitment to Jewish heritage and Jewish community.

Wein said it is important to establish and maintain a position of religious observance that will be meaningful to students.

And Hamilton Hebrew Academy principal Rabbi Morton Green said all kids must be taught to feel a personal responsibility to become recipients and transmitters of Jewish history and tradition.

Rabbi Abraham Soffer from the Associated Hebrew Day Schools noted that it is important to ensure that educational levels remain high by never diluting the program.

Dealing with Curriculum
Finding a threshold of Jewish values

Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education: Some schools have a complete unity between the identity of the school and the community they're serving. However, in those schools where there are real discrepancies between the values of the school and the parent body – where the levels of observance are very different – tension will be created. It can be a healthy tension if it's handled well.

Schools that don't have problems with identity have a greater danger of becoming complacent, falling into ruts and not looking for the next push.

Prof. Alex Pomson, York University: While there are many factors related to the increase in enrolment in Jewish education, there is no question that the decay of the public school system is correlated with the growth of the Jewish day school system in North America.

However, principals have been talking about the reluctance of the lay leadership to define with greater clarity what their school stands for because they don't want to alienate any sector of the population.

Epstein: People may be choosing Jewish education because it is still cheaper than other forms of private school education and they're interested in the social and neighbourhood aspects that the schools can offer.

Zac Kaye, Jewish Campus Services: There are societal pressures as well. People put their kids into Jewish schools because all their friends are doing it, but they aren't really motivated by the level of the Jewish program.

Parents are demanding a style, quality and value system that they want out of their children's education. When you have demand from parents who are looking for something very specific – you see a push and pull going on.

Pomson: The boutique school phenomenon is related to a deepening consumer power in the Jewish community. People have greater disposable wealth and are ready to separate themselves off from the mass in order to pursue certain social and personal needs.

However, I would like to think that there's a bedrock of Jewish values that informs the kinds of decisions that the community makes and encourages a commitment to address the needs of the greatest number within the community in a moral fashion.

Supplementary Education: Crisis or crossroads?

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

At the same time that day schools are enjoying increasing enrolment, after-school Jewish education programs are fighting declining numbers.

Experts say that with parents and students facing increasing demands and pressures, supplementary education is often the first after-school activity to go.

Principal of Beth Tzedec Congregational School Dan Goldberg said changes in secular education have put heavier demands on families.

"Time available for extra curricula is curtailed significantly and kids are exhausted by the time they get here," he said.

In addition, Goldberg said supplementary schools face a shortage of interested and qualified teachers.

It is a difficult profession where the pay isn't ideal and there is little respect. Furthermore, Goldberg noted, the Federation of Jewish Teachers' Union makes requirements regarding certification that may not necessarily be effective in an afternoon Hebrew school classroom.

Traditional classroom techniques and approaches need to be replaced by more creative approaches that employ elements of informal education, he said.

Karen Goodis of Shaar Shalom Religious School pointed to the need to implement outreach to the unaffiliated.

"It's important to make our schools and synagogues welcoming and affordable communities," she said.

As the public school curriculum changes and more families have two working parents, there is pressure to move to less frequent sessions, Goodis pointed out.

And while programs can be exciting, learning requires commitment, time and effort from students and teachers.

"If the next generation of Jews are going to be educated and care about Jewish life and institutions, we need to change the approach many families have towards Jewish education," Goodis said.

Eli Kirshblum of Adath Israel Congregational School said the most critical issue facing supplementary education is its very survival.

"The population of Conservative movement schools is going down yearly and the United Synagogue movement has no ability to set standards for each shul," he said.

Michelle Lynn from Holy Blossom Temple Afternoon School said her greatest challenge is finding personnel to deliver the program.

"We have limited hours to offer and funds to pay talented people. Many begin their careers here and then leave as soon as soon as they find full-time jobs."

Lynn also said educators need to find the imagination and courage to think of different ways to bring up the next generation of educated Jews and not get stuck in the assumption that education has to mean "school."

Joan Schoenfeld from the Downtown Jewish Community School said outreach and publicity are crucial.

"Parents need to be educated about the types of schools available and the differences in philosophy among schools."

In addition, the available pool of good, qualified teachers continues to shrink, Schoenfeld said.

And cost and funding have become important factors because supplementary schools have lost various government grants over the past few years.

Hopefully, Schoenfeld said, the availability of tax credits may reduce the financial pressures on UJA Federation's subsidies to day schools, and the role of supplementary schools in expanding Jewish education will be recognized and funded.

Supplementary School Education
Creativity crucial to survival

Prof. Alex Pomson, York University: I like to think of the world of supplementary education as a very fragile ecosystem. It is a very brutal, tough world to work in.

After-school education is much more sensitive to the smallest changes in the social or academic environment than the day-school system. The relationship between families and synagogue life has also had a profound influence on supplementary schools.

On the other hand, it's no coincidence that many of the more creative developments in Jewish education have emerged out of supplementary education.

For example, family education, which is now working its way into day schools, initiated in supplementary schools. And dealing with Jewish education in experiential terms is something that congregational and supplementary schools have been more willing to contemplate.

Some classrooms in the United States have effectively abandoned the classroom to allow for a more individualized approach.

Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education: For the most part, supplementary schools get their children from that segment of the population for which Judaism is less essential to their lives. That again contributes to the fragility of the eco-system. It also means that you have to do everything you can, in an outreach fashion, to get to these people and not turn them off.

You have to be very careful about curriculum and tuition.

One of the few advantages of supplementary schools is that they have a greater chance of community, especially if a school is connected to a synagogue.

Zac Kaye, Jewish Campus Services: The panacea for supplementary school is innovation. Tying those schools together with camping or Jewish community centres would provide all sorts of opportunities. There doesn't seem to be a flow today between all the different programs out there. Each one is doing their own thing.

For a more detailed look at the dilemmas facing after school programs, see page B18.

The Double Cohort Challenge

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

With the double-cohort year fast approaching, the only ones taking it all in stride seem to be the students.

September 2003 may see double the number of usual applicants to Ontario universities as the first batch of Grade 12 students complete a new four-year curriculum at the same time as the last graduates of the five-year OAC program finish their studies.

The Ontario Ministry of Education states that it is preparing for the estimated 78,000 additional spots needed by 2005-06.

However, People for Education, a grassroots research and lobby group, claims that in September 2003, the 18 universities across the province will be ready for only 60,000 students.

That could leave a short-term shortfall of close to 20,000 spots. Universities are asking the government for more operating funds to hire additional teachers and staff to deal with the problem.

The government has appointed two working groups to study the double cohort issues and claims that it will be ready.

In the meantime, guidance counsellors are telling students to work harder because admissions to universities may be based mainly on grades. At this point, there is no indication that any consideration will be given to extra-curricular activities.

This year's Grade 11 students are being told to think about taking an extra year to retake or add courses. Some guidance counsellors are recommending that parents send their children for post-secondary education outside of Toronto.

In addition, parents and students are being told to widen their options and consider universities or colleges in smaller towns or out of the province.

And while a ministry of education spokesperson stated that they have established a working group to ensure that neither cohort is disadvantaged when applying to universities and colleges, parents are being told that the "new-curriculumed" four-year students will be given no special consideration when competing with students graduating from the older five-year OAC program.

Chana Libman

Some parents are claiming that the four-year graduates are at a disadvantage because they've had to cope with a newer, harder curriculum sometimes even before textbooks have been available or teachers prepared to deliver the program.

The OAC students, on the other hand, are being pressured to fast-track through the system in order to get to university by next year. At high-school meetings, administrators have been telling parents to curb their anger against the province for creating this crunch and work with their kids to put together timetables for next year.

Dana Doidge

Choosing courses has become much more important for students in the new four-year high school program because they are required to prepare and maintain annual education plans to meet year-to-year course requirements.

However, it is difficult to formulate any future plans because many universities haven't even nailed down their acceptance criteria. Standards will depend on the number of applicants they receive as well as the amount of funding allocated from the province.

Four teens face the future

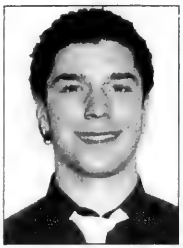
And with classes and student faculty ratios rising as high as they can go, the only things left to go up are the admission standards required of the incoming class.

Within this backdrop of uncertainty, The CJN revisited the four students introduced last year.

Chana Libman, Dana Doidge, Noah Buckman and Yonah Krakowsky are now in Grade 11 and have one more year to go before they finish high school. All four students said that, ideally, they would like to eventually go to medical school.



Noah Buckman

Yonah Krakowsky

Dana, who is in the Claude Watson Arts program at Earl Haig Secondary School, was the only one who said that the double cohort problem is an issue that she thinks about.

"I'm always aware of it," Dana said. "Universities are recommending that we work as hard as we can and the cut off grades keep going up."

It's very difficult to be studying in such an uncertain environment, she added.

While Dana and Noah hope to go to university right after high school, Chana and Yonah are planning to take some time off and go to Israel after graduating.

"I'm still planning, God-willing, to go to Israel the year after I finish high school – maybe to a seminary," said Chana, who is at Ulpanat Orot Girls School.

Yonah, an Or Chaim student, is considering going to a yeshiva. However, he hasn't dismissed going to a kibbutz for awhile.

"Milking cows might be kind of fun," Yonah said.

For university, Yonah is considering New York as an option.

Pursuing post-secondary education out of town is something Noah is also considering seriously.

"I wouldn't mind going to Western or McGill after high school," the Community Hebrew Academy student said.

"If I can keep up my average, then it shouldn't be too much of a problem," Noah added.

Ontario joins provinces funding independent schools

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For just about anybody who hasn't won a lottery, $12,500 is a lot of money.

In some parts of the country, it's a down payment on a house; pretty much anywhere, it will buy a used car, partly furnish a home, buy a luxury vacation for two almost anywhere. For those with tighter budgets, it will buy groceries, pay the rent, heat a home and put gas in the van.

Whether it's for luxuries or necessities, $12,500 could solve a lot of problems. But for thousands of Ontario parents with children in Jewish day schools, $12,500 covers the average high school tuition for only one child for one year. Spending the money while their Roman Catholic neighbours receive full public financial support to educate their children in religious schools means most will have to cut corners somewhere else.

'Most will have to cut corners somewhere else'

For years, parents and Jewish organizations bristled at the inequity while trying to persuade a succession of Ontario governments and opposition parties that justice demanded non-Catholic religious schools also receive public funding.

Advocates of public funding pointed to other jurisdictions across Canada, arguing that provinces from British Columbia to Quebec fund Jewish schools and those of other religious denominations, to varying degrees.

As Alberta embraced a charter-school alternative, a variety of funding schemes were discussed, from the provision of school vouchers, to creation of associated school boards, to tax relief to outright grants.

Then, in its spring 2001 budget, the Ontario government surprised just about everyone by announcing that, beginning Jan. 1, 2002, it would offer tax credits to parents sending their children to independent schools. The credits are being phased in over five years and will eventually be worth $3,500 per student.

The announcement proved controversial, as supporters of public schools warned it would suck money out of the public system and put the future of public education in doubt.

Supporters of the tax credit argued it was a good first step, but that it didn't equal the funding available to parents with kids in the Catholic system.

The development was a long time coming, but it merely meant Ontario was joining other provinces – whether led by governments of the right or left – that have been funding independent schools for years, without the apparent collapse of their public systems.

According to the Federation of Independent Schools in Canada, an Alberta-based national advocacy group, British Columbia, for one, has been funding independent schools since 1989.

B.C.'s Group 1 schools – which have education programs consistent with ministerial orders, employ certified teachers and comply with other provincial regulations – receive operating grants of 50 per cent of adjusted per student operating costs in the local public district. The provincial average is $3,000.

In Alberta, accredited private schools receive a basic instructional grant of about $2,544 per student, an amount equal to 60 per cent of the basic instructional grant given to public schools.

Saskatchewan funds only a few existing independent schools, which receive $4,924 per student, while Manitoba provides a per-pupil grant of 50 per cent of the net operating expenditures for public schools based on allocations in the previous two years. For 2001-02, that amounted to $3,018 per student.

Quebec independent primary schools receive about 58 per cent of the per pupil grant available to public schools. The other provinces do not provide direct grant support.

When fully implemented in five years, the Ontario tax credit will refund to parents about half the per pupil grant in Ontario public schools, said Georganne Burke, secretary of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools. Between 12,000 and 13,000 youngsters attend Jewish day schools in Ontario.

Burke, who's working on the campaign of Tory leadership candidate Tony Clement, said even if the credit covered 100 per cent of the Ontario per pupil cost, it would leave Jewish parents short of the $12,500 average tuition fee charged by high schools and the average $8,300 charged by elementary schools. Furthermore, she pointed out, parents must pay the tuition and wait months for tax season before they get a refund.

'Parents must pay the tuition and wait months for tax season before they get a refund'

Nevertheless, the tax-credit scheme "will ease the burden on parents with children in day schools," said Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region.

The Jewish community, which has been lobbying for financial assistance for years, did not favour any specific funding method. "Before the May 2001 budget, we never thought of a tax credit system," Morgan said.

"Before the tax credits came in, we'd have been happy with anything, because it was such a glaring case of discrimination that was crying out for some remedy."

In 1985, he pointed out, educator Bernard Shapiro completed a report on private schools in Ontario. Shapiro, then director of the Ontario Institute of Studies in Education (OISE), recommended creation of a "new creature, a hybrid public/private institution under the wing of the Ministry of Education."

While the Shapiro report gathered dust, talks were under way behind the scenes between B'nai Brith and Catholic boards to see if, in a test case, a Jewish school could come under the auspices of the separate board and be funded that way. Talks proved unsuccessful.

"History has shown that any arrangement has to be negotiated or blessed by the government of the day, and not with other school boards," Morgan said.

An association between Jewish schools and a separate school board was one of 10 options outlined by Shapiro in his 1985 report.

Eventually, he narrowed the possibilities to four: taxable grants to parents; limited support in the form of subsidized materials, transportation, etc.; a voucher system with a cap on total school spending; and the associated schools model.

He further narrowed his choices to the voucher and associates school models, saying implementation of either would address the funding issue while offering healthy competition for public schools.

"Private schools, once planned or operating, would apply to either the public or the separate board for associated status," the report stated.

Shapiro, who now serves as principal of McGill University, thinks the school board association model is even more relevant now than it was 17 years ago.

"I think people are looking for more alternatives today than they did in the 1980s," he said. "People are interested in custom-made choices rather than ones off the rack."

An association between public and independent schools gives parents a choice in education approaches while maintaining the strength of the public system in providing "some sort of common ground" beyond television and visits to shopping malls, he said.

The tax credit approach "does nothing for common citizenship."

Charter schools, another model he investigated in 1985, "could be quite helpful," but they limit students' exposure "to the whole world."

Vouchers, he continued, are problematic. While they give parents choice, they can also be seen to "subsidize the wealthy." He suggested there should be limits on the choices available to parents, but that would require a consensus on the vision of the society we want to build.

"In the end, we all have to live together and we can't live together living apart," he said.

Jewish schools and the accountability question

By ED MORGAN

Curriculum accountability: as the saying goes, is it good for the Jews?

In the Jewish tradition, let's answer the question with another question. Is it good for the Muslims? Or the Doukhobors? Or, on a slightly different note, the Montessori movement?

Ed Morgan

It is no secret that in the post-Sept. 11th climate, the issue of religious schooling is uppermost in policymakers' minds. Some monitoring is called for since the school setting does not itself guarantee political innocence. No one should forget the fact that the very word Taliban means "students."

Of course, international terrorism is not about to emerge from any Ontario schools. However, Mohammad Khalid of the Islamic Society of North America, which runs several schools in the Greater Toronto Area, is on record in this newspaper as being concerned enough about those Islamic schools that are not part of his organization that he advocates Ministry of Education oversight for all religious schools in the province. Likewise, well-known social commentator and journalist Irshad Manji has courageously written about the misogynistic and anti-Semitic education she received in an Islamic school in British Columbia.

Since worldwide problems have washed up on our shores, it behooves us to also take a close look at some more homegrown concerns. For example, the Chosen People Ministries and the City of David Hebrew-Christian Church, have established themselves in Hamilton and Thornhill. Both of these organizations actively seek Jewish converts, and are recognized as religious groups in Ontario that run evening and Sunday educational programs and schools. And then there are the Doukhobors, whose religious doctrines about public nudity and arson have been a source of continuous conflict with the authorities in western Canada.

This is not to say that the opponents of private education are correct when they argue that religious schools teach intolerance or foster harmful social divisions. For the Jewish day schools, nothing could be further from the truth. As an example, the only Toronto area school to receive last year's Canadian Black History Month Association's education award was the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

We are justifiably proud of our own accomplishments with respect to multicultural education and tolerance; this, in turn, should prompt us to accept (and demand) a level of public accountability for all schools that will ensure that no groups are crossing the appropriate line.

While transparency and accountability are justifiable on the tolerance front, curriculum may well present a very different set of issues. The debates surrounding the Tory leadership race have to a large extent centred on this very question. Some of the candidates favour the status quo of no accountability, while others argue that public tax subsidies should come with curricular strings attached.

Public funding and accountability:

Should day schools be worried?

By PAUL SHAVIV

Ontario is certainly not the first jurisdiction to ask privately sponsored faith-based schools to meet minimum standards in return for direct or indirect funding. In Britain, for example, Jewish schools have been able to integrate into the public education system for over 150 years and many have done so, especially since the 1944 Education Act. Closer to home, Quebec funds the general studies programs of nearly all the schools in the Montreal Jewish system.

Paul Shaviv

What do schools fear? Will the government interfere with the way that Jewish studies are taught? Will compulsory general studies courses contain material that the schools may feel contradicts their "core values?" Will the hiring of teachers be restricted because of the need to meet minimum professional qualifications? Overall, will schools lose control over the education they wish to provide?

No one can guarantee the long-term decisions of the Ontario government, but experience elsewhere suggests that we probably do not have too much to be afraid of, and possibly a great deal to welcome. Most governments are little concerned with private schools and tend to leave them alone as long as they are reasonably well and safely run and don't cause trouble. By the same token, schools and school systems seem to evolve mechanisms to avoid the most sensitive culture clashes in general studies – either by carefully exercising legitimate choices or by negotiating new provisions in the curriculum.

However, in general, the requirement to conform to even minimum standards brings many benefits. It makes teachers, and therefore schools, more professional. It is often a catalyst to new educational thinking and planning within the school. It tends to increase parents' confidence in the system. As well, in the complicated age in which we live, no one should object to the requirement that all school employees must undergo checks for criminal records. And some health and safety requirements are indisputably beneficial.

Minimum standards bring many benefits

Occasionally, there are disadvantages to minimum standards. In England, for example, the level of Jewish studies, including the knowledge of Hebrew, in Jewish day schools is lamentably low, because the standard required for subject skills and knowledge in religious studies in the public examination system is low, and many Jewish schools feel no incentive to go beyond it. Is that a possible problem in Ontario, where the system is different? Unlikely.

Accountability, wherever it comes from, may be painful, but it is generally recognized as, ultimately, a good thing for institutions, organizations and individuals. Jewish schools are really no different. While it may take time for the school system to adjust to a new reality, the benefit to our parent body of the new Ontario tax credit for private school tuition will be considerable – and equitable! It should be welcomed.

Paul Shaviv is the headmaster of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Parents support their children...

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

When school life started to become difficult for Josh, he and his family had to work together to help him get back on track.

Until Grade 5, Josh had been a stellar student who was active in sports. However, lower grades and signals from the school and his teachers about Josh's behaviour left his family wondering what was going on. He had, for example, begun to clown around and to speak out in class inappropriately.

An important turning point for the family came when his parents took him to a specialist and he was ultimately diagnosed with a mild form of Tourette's syndrome.

"I was pretty shocked when the doctor told me. I had no idea that there was anything wrong with me and didn't understand what it all meant," Josh said in an interview.

Children with Tourette's, which is neurologically based, often display involuntary, rapid, sudden movements and/or tics, which can be vocal or physical, and occur nearly every day.

Symptoms are experienced in the same way as sneezes – almost impossible to hold back.

About three per cent of the population is affected to some degree, said Rosie Wartecker, executive director of the Tourette's Syndrome Foundation in Canada.

Teachers and parents often don't understand the disorder, said Josh's mother, Ellen. What frequently happens is that the children start getting punished for things they can't stop themselves from doing.

Because he is an outgoing kid, she said, Josh took on the role of class clown as a way to cover up for a medical disorder he didn't understand.

"As my behaviour got worse, problems in school began to escalate because everyone just expected me to misbehave," said Josh, who was in a Jewish day school until Grade 7.

After he was diagnosed, Josh and his parents began investigating and reading as much as they could about Tourette's in order to help Josh cope.

"The Tourette's Syndrome Foundation became an incredible support group for us as a family," Ellen said. "We didn't realize how many people were affected by the disorder and their advice helped us understand what was happening.

"We met incredible people – professionals and sports figures," she said. "It really helped us to see all these people out there who are affected by Tourette's.

"The next hurdle for us as parents," Ellen said, "was to educate Josh's teachers about his disorder."

The foundation helped the family develop strategies for teachers to use, including breaks outside the classroom when Josh needed them.

"However, it became impossible to organize a time that teachers would agree to come in and meet the experts we would bring in," Ellen said. "They insisted that union regulations wouldn't allow their free time to be used to help a child.

"Even after we would explain the source of Josh's problems, most of the teachers still insisted that he was simply trying to get out of doing things."

They also pointed to the fact that a class of 25 students didn't allow them to meet specific individual needs, Ellen added.

"But because Josh is so bright, creating a place for him to have structured breaks wouldn't have been so difficult. It wouldn't have taken Josh a lot of time to catch up with any missed material.

"Not allowing him to take breaks was like denying diabetic children their insulin," Ellen said. "But the teachers just didn't see this."

Josh has since changed school systems and is now doing much better, his mother said, adding that in his current school environment, which is structured and consistent, Josh is an A student. He also plays select hockey almost every night of the week.

Ellen also noted that it is important for Josh to hear positive comments from his teachers.

"These kids need more positive [feedback] because they hear so much that is negative all the time," she added.

"I feel much less stressed now," Josh said.

Josh's advice to kids with Tourette's is not to be scared of it nor afraid to tell people that you have it.

"Once I told people, I felt a lot better getting it off my chest," Josh said.

Always be optimistic, he added, because the symptoms can get milder over time.

It's also important as parents to always support your children, Ellen noted. "Josh had to know that everyone has their issues and we were going to make this work because we loved him unconditionally no matter what."

Many children would rather not go to school every day, but few come to hate it as much as 11-year-old Jonathan did two years ago.

He loathed school to the point where he'd sit and devise ways to get out of class – until one day, his plan turned dangerous.

"When I was in Grade 2 [in a Jewish day school], I went into the boys' bathroom and clogged the sinks with paper towels," says Jonathan, recalling the events that ultimately changed the course of his life.

"Then I turned on all the taps and pumped soap into the sinks. The sinks started to overflow. When there was this much water on the floor," he said, using his fingers to indicate about two inches, "the vice-principal came in and slipped."

Though many teachers and parents would have branded Jonathan a bad child or a behaviour problem, his parents Gill and Ian knew better.

"For me that was a turning point," said Gill, sitting at her dining room table across from Jonathan. "I wasn't sure whether he was gifted, but I recognized that he was very bored."

Jonathan took an IQ test, was found to be gifted and was subsequently enrolled in the primary gifted program at a public school, where he was much happier.

"In the regular class, the teacher tells you what to do and you do it," Jonathan explained. "In the gifted program, you go into more depth. The teachers develop and stimulate your brain more. They don't tell you how to do something. They give you choices about how you want to do your work and you figure it out on your own."

Jonathan's three older sisters are also gifted, and they have similar praise for the gifted program.

"In the gifted class, you cover the same curriculum as in the regular class," said Debra, 13, and a student at another public school, "but you learn it faster, and in more breadth and depth. For example, we learn a unit in math in one week instead of one month, and because we're learning at a faster pace, we go on to work we wouldn't otherwise learn for a couple of years."

While Jonathan and his sisters got the enrichment they needed, other children aren't always so fortunate.

"Gifted children are often misunderstood," says Dr. Otto Weininger, professor emeritus at University of Toronto and a clinical child psychologist who works with gifted and challenged children.

"When they're bored in class, they develop their own curriculum, and then they're accused of not paying attention. They are beyond the teacher and move rapidly, in a different way. Sometimes they're thought of as nerds, as too different, and they don't feel as though they're part of the group," he says.

"When kids aren't understood, their difficulties evolve into emotional problems. They're not worked with adequately, they express disinterest in their academics and flounder."

Some statistics suggest that the high school dropout rate is split evenly among gifted children and poor students.

While there are gifted and enrichment programs for children, there is concern that fewer and fewer children will be able to attend them. Children must be tested and recommended for special programs, but with the recent abolition of mandatory Grade 3 IQ tests, there won't be as easy a way to recognize a gifted child.

Gill, who has sat on various educational and advocacy committees, fears that soon there won't even be a publicly funded gifted program.

"I think they're slowly dismantling the program," she said. "With no mandatory testing, fewer gifted children will be found, gifted classrooms will get smaller and smaller, and the board will then say they can't justify the cost of having one teacher in a room with five or 10 students. A lot more kids will slip through the cracks."

Her kids agreed that a destreamed program could create difficulties.

"If they do dismantle the gifted program we'll all be in one big class and the kids won't be able to get along because there will be too many differences," Jonathan said. "It will be hard to talk through problems because one kid will be speaking at a higher level than the other. And we'll have nowhere to go to get more intellectual stimulation."

"The kids who learn more easily would get bored and start talking to other students who may not learn as quickly," Gill added. "The whole class would be disturbed. I think you'd find this at a greater level."

As a result of the elimination of mandatory testing, Weininger advises parents to be their kids' protectors. "Parents have to be strong and stand up for their kids. They have to look for indications that their child may be gifted and speak to their child's principal to find out about gifted programs."

Otherwise, gifted children and society as a whole could suffer.

"I'd like to think that gifted kids are encouraged to develop and take a leadership role," Gill said. "It would be a disappointment to see that potential not come to fruition. You can't teach down the middle. The board's policy is to allow each person to develop to their full potential, but without the gifted program, this can't happen."

Facing the accountability question

For Jewish day schools, the issue is not quite so severe as it is for Montessori schools or other programs whose entire rationale is to present a different curricular choice. Jewish education predates the Ontario school curriculum by several thousand years. It did not arise as a protest or a pedagogical alternative to Algebra or to Shakespeare or to the War of 1812.

Catholic separate schools, with whom the Jewish day schools have always sought parity, fully comply with the Ontario curriculum. No one is proposing that kind of far-reaching control, but some compliance needs to be considered.

In recent weeks, Ernie Eves, the most outspoken advocate of independent school accountability, has indicated that his real concern is with standards, not curriculum. The goal is to ensure that tax subsidies are being spent on schools that, at the very least, convey the "three R's."

From a policy point of view, this proposal is entirely reasonable. It is any government's responsibility to strive for a literate and productive population. Our political leaders are now indicating that everyone must meet basic standards of education, but that how we get there is a matter of parental and school choice. This is what the Jewish day schools have wanted all along.

Ed Morgan is chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and a professor of international law at the University of Toronto.

More kids turning to tutors for help

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

A few years ago, having a tutor wasn't considered the coolest thing, but today, perceptions have changed dramatically.

In recent years, tutoring companies across the province have noted marked increases in the number of students enlisting their services.

"It's so common now to have a tutor," says John Tzelardoni, part owner of Math Masters Inc., which opened in Toronto in 1994 to teach math, English and science to an expanding clientele.

"Kids walk into the waiting room and realize there are four classmates in the room," he says.

Other tutoring companies, such as Oxford Learning Centres and Kumon Math and Reading Centres, have also seen their numbers surge. As enrolment rises, some centres have noted changes in their clientele: tutors are no longer just for students having difficulty in class.

"The educational reality today is that average isn't good enough to get into [the best] university," says Steve Lewis, director of two Oxford Learning Centre franchises in Toronto.

"We've noticed a significant increase in the number of people choosing tutoring even if their kids are doing well in school. They want their kids to have a leg up," says Lewis, noting that Oxford helps improve reading, writing, math and study skills.

Industry experts say a number of factors explain these trends.

"Today, parents are more aware of what's happening in education," says Sandy Franco of Kumon, which has experienced a 150 percent increase in enrolment in its reading program over the last five years.

"There's provincial testing for grades three and six in reading, writing and math, a Grade 9 math test and a Grade 10 literacy test," says Franco. "When parents see their kids performing at certain levels, they can compare it to other kids at the national and provincial levels. Parents send their kids to Kumon to supplement their child's education if they noticed problems on the tests or to ensure their kids stay ahead."

Another major factor is the new curriculum.

"The curriculum in Ontario schools changed three years ago," says Tzelardoni. "They're trying to cut five years of topics into four years. They've pushed Grade 10 curriculum into Grade 9 and they've even introduced some Grade 11 curriculum to the Grade 9s.

"They're not really preparing primary students for the upper levels, and kids are overwhelmed," says Tzelardoni, noting that more grade nine and 10 students have been coming to Math Masters in the past couple of years.

Franco also thinks the jam-packed curriculum is creating problems for kids, not only because the material is tougher, but also because there is less time for students to absorb new concepts.

"Tutoring programs provide students with the opportunity to practice the material so it won't be a stumbling block in the classroom," she says.

Though the curriculum is taught at a faster pace and the material is harder, Lewis says students aren't able to get the kind of attention kids used to get from their teachers.

"Parents want their kids to be able and ready without relying on the school system," he says. "They know the education system is stressed and that teachers are doing the best they can with limited resources."

And despite their best efforts, Lewis says parents may be unable to help their children.

"Parents are having difficulty helping their kids with the new math curriculum," he says.

"We're finding that the new curriculum is creating more homework and stress at home. It can be hard for parents to work with their own kids, but if their child isn't an independent worker, it means parents have to work with them, and it can be stressful," he says.

"Parents come to us with a big help sign."

According to those in the field, children will leave with a new and improved attitude, better grades and more confidence, especially since many centres also teach time-management and study skills, factors that contribute to academic performance.

"Because we're able to zero in on the needs of each individual student, we can show significant gains with them," says Lewis.

"We guarantee parents a change in the attitudes of their children. They'll be amazed at how much their kids will enjoy [being tutored]. The program is fun and teachers are well trained and motivating," he says.

All it takes, these tutors say, are a couple of hours a week.

Services available for pressured families

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

There is a growing need for services to help families in this complex world we live in, says social worker Beth Feffer.

"Today, we have a greater awareness of the increased pressures students face and we are more able to respond," says Feffer, who is a manager of school social work services at Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), a preventative outreach and consulting program that services six day school systems, the Toronto District School Board in the North York area and 12 York Region public schools.

Peer pressure, fitting in, bullying, academic competition and a host of other pressures have impacted on young people, says Rosalie Sniderman, principal of the Posluns Education Centre, located at the Neptune Branch of the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto.

"Parents are much more aware [than in the past] of the social and emotional needs of their children and are willing to be open and look for professional assistance," she says.

Sniderman, an educator for more than 25 years, says the increase in demand may be due to the growing number of single-parent families, as well as the stresses caused by job insecurity, longer working hours, and families with two working parents.

"Parents want to be good parents and are open to seeking assistance," she says. "The help is discreet and we try to defer any type of labelling."

The stigma attached to psychological and remedial help has decreased as more and more families face home, educational and peer pressures.

"It is not only children with different needs who require help," Sniderman says. "Students with exceptional abilities and talents can benefit from the support services as well."

When a parent or teacher has a concern, the home and the school work together to find the best coping methods for both the student and the family, Sniderman says. An interview is scheduled between the parents and a counsellor or principal so they can arrive at a more comprehensive understanding of the difficulty and decide on an appropriate course of action.

"This [action] may include an assessment by a Jewish Vocational Service [JVS] psycho-educational or tutoring and remediation consultant," Sniderman says.

Ruth Borchiver, director of educational services at JVS, says the increase in density of study, notably in high school, has become common knowledge.

Parents are willing to investigate the sources of their children's academic difficulties more readily now than in the past, she says.

"There is evidence that psychological services which include assessment and consultation are often decisive in enabling children with barriers to learning succeed in day school programs."

Principals are more aware of problems such as groupings and conflicts, says Feffer. As an example, she says, schools have put in place anti-bullying programs.

"Usually the child doing the bullying has a feeling of low self-esteem," Feffer says. "Children need to learn ways to respond non violently. When this situation becomes evident, it is important to listen to the child.

"Children today have increased peer pressure to fit in. Sometimes they turn to smoking, alcohol or drugs as a way of gaining acceptance from their peers."

Parents are encouraged to meet with the school social worker and may be referred to parenting programs at the school, the agency or in the community, Feffer says.

BJE launches new Web site

In an effort to make resources and information more accessible, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education has launched a Web site for educators, parents and students.

The Web site (www.bjetoronto.com) provides a variety of resources for teachers – from a library of educational CD-ROMS and reviews of selected books and videos that educators can "try before they buy," to lists of professional development, job and grant opportunities.

The site has recently expanded to include links to general studies materials such as lesson plans, puzzlemakers, and maps.

In addition, there is a holiday section which includes listings of useful materials that can be helpful for teachers and students.

Parents can find contact names and addresses, as well as short descriptions about Jewish schools. And students can find listings of Web sites for research projects, information about inter-school programs, and enjoy looking at photos of themselves.

Special needs education thriving at Hebrew day schools

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

There have been some exciting developments at many Hebrew day schools in the field of special education, says special education consultant Dori Levine.

"Attempts are being made to accommodate students who have never before been accommodated," says Levine, who has been with the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) for four years.

Each school is autonomous and has either created its own special education program or has plugged into the services provided by Jewish Family & Child Service or Jewish Vocational Service of Metro Toronto, she says.

"Over the years, we have seen a changing attitude towards special needs education. There is no longer a stigma attached to students who require the services."

Levine says the BJE plays an important role in helping to sensitize the community and in ensuring that students have access to necessary services.

Representatives from a number of Hebrew day schools met recently to discuss special education programs, she says.

"It was very empowering for them to be able to talk about their differences and to acknowledge areas that need development. Everyone was very enthusiastic about sharing their ideas."

One of the board's new initiatives is the tikun chaim program directed by Debbie Gladstone, who works within the school community to help students obtain access to available resources.

She says that community care access centres have received funding so private schools can provide services for students with medical related disabilities.

"I would like to see some of this money go to our day schools," she says. "[The CCACs] have been slow in responding, but we are working on it."

Gladstone, who came to the BJE about four months ago, works as a liaison between schools and agencies such as JVS and JF&CS to help obtain necessary services for students.

"I feel very lucky to be participating in a community that sees the need for additional resources for all children beginning at preschool," she says.

A number of schools have hired senior resource teachers to help co-ordinate special needs programs in their schools, says Gladstone.

Shana Harris, who has been principal of general studies at Bialik Hebrew Day School for 16 years, says that a remedial specialist is in the school 1½ days a week.

"She works with teachers to help identify students as young as kindergarten age, and helps develop supports for them," Harris says. "That could be in-class support, or occupational or speech therapy. It all depends on the individual student."

The school also has two full-time remedial teachers in the general studies program, and provides support in Hebrew reading. "We have always provided support for special needs children, but in the last 15 years, that support has doubled," says Harris.

Since services have increased, she says, student retention rate has increased. "I know we are enabling more children to have a Jewish education."

Bialik offers psychological and educational testing to its students at no cost, she says, and in the last two years has obtained government funding for occupational and speech therapy.

"Teachers are also learning to provide modification to their programs so students are comfortable in the classroom setting," says Harris.

Last spring at Eitz Chaim, special education co-ordinator Donna Cassels was hired to help co-ordinate services at the school's three campuses.

It is the intention of the school, she says, to provide educational support to special needs students both through the use of direct instruction and through ongoing adjustment to programs in the regular classroom.

Wherever possible, resource teachers work with regular classroom teachers to adapt curriculum to the unique needs of individual students, Cassels says.

"Where it is apparent that a student requires significant skill building in a specific area, the student may be withdrawn from the classroom either individually or in small groups."

Dafna Ross, co-ordinator of support services at the three campuses of United Synagogue Day Schools, says the school has always had a special education program, but it recently developed her position so "services could be more pro-active.

"We are trying to set up a centralized framework of support for teachers and students and facilitate the effectiveness of the service in order to maximize the learning profile of all students."

When assessing students, Ross says, it is important to look at the whole child. "Sometimes children will act out emotionally because they cannot keep up academically."

Gail Baker, principal and one of the founders of Toronto Heschel School, says she and two other teachers are part of a child-study team that goes into the classroom and suggests program modifications for any child who needs it.

"The emphasis at our school is on small-group learning so it is easier to teach the kids. We try to work with all children in the classroom setting," says Baker.

If a child is weak in one area, she says, they try and focus on their strengths in another area. "It's not jargon – it's how you look at the whole child."

At Netivot HaTorah Day School, there has been a special needs co-ordinator for four years.

Carol Weir, who has held the position since last year, says the school has always had remedial teachers on staff, but felt it was necessary to have someone co-ordinate services.

Parents press for change in supplementary schools

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Martin Berman laments what he calls "an unfortunate trend in Jewish education" that is manifesting itself at his own synagogue, Shaar Shalom Congregation, in Thornhill.

The Shaar Shalom Religious School, which serves 150 children from kindergarten through Grade 8 (about one third of whom are members of the synagogue), will change in September from its current three-day-a-week schedule to Sunday morning plus one weekday.

The new format will cut classroom time from 5½ to 5 hours a week, but the school will have a required Shabbat minyan six times a year, conforming to one of six models deemed acceptable by United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, the umbrella for the Conservative movement.

"Parents are less prepared to make the sacrifices necessary for Jewish education," said Rabbi Berman. "I am not happy with it, but I recognize that for the survival of the school, either we accept the changes or lose the school."

In fact, the school lost about 50 students this year. "With the new public school curriculum," explained principal Karen Goodis, "parents are finding it very difficult to have their children attend two nights plus a weekend, and get all their schoolwork done."

To the best of Goodis' knowledge, there are only two other Conservative congregations of the seven in the Greater Toronto Area that still run three-day-a-week Hebrew schools. The others have all moved to two days.

"There will certainly be increased pressure on them," she believes.

For Elisa Morton Palter, a mother of three and board member of an independent Hebrew school – and for other parents who don't want to eat into Sunday family time – Hebrew schools like Shaar Shalom's aren't even an option.

"My husband's work is very busy during the week, but he has made it clear the weekends are for us," Morton Palter said.

She and her husband Gilbert also ruled out Jewish day school. Among their reasons were their own positive experiences attending public schools; their desire to expose their children to a multicultural society; confidence that their wide circle of Jewish friends would provide a Jewish social milieu; and their proximity to a good neighbourhood public school.

When they couldn't find an existing Hebrew school that met their needs, Morton Palter began seeking like-minded parents and started her own one-afternoon-a-week community Hebrew school in the York Mills and Bayview area.

New Public School curriculum spurs move to two days a week

Coincidentally, another mother, Lisa Taerk, started Ledbury Community Hebrew School for similar reasons and along the same lines about five years ago. The two schools merged last year, keeping the Ledbury name and the York Mills area location. The Banbury Community Centre venue is at capacity for its 55 students, ranging from kindergarten to Grade 6.

In addition to searching for a new location for its burgeoning population, including a significant number of younger siblings, affiliated families must decide what to do about their children's bar and bat mitzvahs when their educational hours do not qualify them to have Saturday morning celebrations at certain synagogues.

At Shaar Shalom, for example – as at other United Synagogue affiliates – youngsters who want to have a Saturday morning bar or bat mitzvah must be enrolled in a 5½-hour-a-week, BJE-recognized program of Jewish studies, at minimum.

"To have a celebration on Shabbat morning is a privilege," explained Rabbi Berman. "One has to merit it by meeting educational standards."

At Beth Sholom Synagogue, which used to be part of United Synagogue but is now unaffiliated, there is still "support and enforcement of United Synagogue policy," said Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich. Exceptions may be made by the synagogue's ritual committee in certain circumstances.

"The feeling was that the bar or bat mitzvah is a celebration of progression into Jewish life, and the thing that marks the ability to progress in Jewish life is education," said Rabbi Flanzraich. "I believe that the policies were and are meant to help our children become educated so that they can participate in Jewish congregational life."

A YEAR OF LIVING – AND LEARNING – JEWISHLY: Kids from Beth Torah Synagogue and Summit Heights Co-operative Hebrew School explore the Beth Torah bimah as part of a hands-on program in the year leading up to their bar and bat mitzvahs.

Parents press for change in supplementary schools

"I think [our] parents understand that the synagogues have a mandate," said Morton Palter. "They have to do what they have to do. They have their reasons, and they're valid." She doesn't believe her fellow parents are angry about synagogue policies, but she does encounter some frustration.

For the most part however, they look at other options, like independent synagogues or Israel-based celebrations.

Morton Palter stressed the strong commitment of her fellow parents to Jewish education. "All of us have had to work enormously hard."

Morton Palter and her husband, as participants in the Wexner Heritage Foundation program for up-and-coming Jewish community leaders in the late 1990s, faced an additional test of their commitment.

Among the 38 families represented in the Toronto Wexner group, they were in a small minority as parents of supplementary Hebrew school – as opposed to Jewish day school – students. In fact, said Morton Palter, when her husband was interviewed before the program, the first question he remembers being asked was, "Why aren't your kids in day school?"

At the end of the intensive two-year program, however, they remained convinced that they'd made the right decision for their family.

In the Toronto area, 11,488 children attend BJE-affiliated day schools, 5,700 attend affiliated supplementary schools and more than 550 students attend unaffiliated supplementary schools, according to statistics provided by the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) for the 2001-2002 year.

Morton Palter feels the perception among Jewish community members, in general, is that supplementary school is a "second choice, or even a fifth choice" compared to day school, but Seymour Epstein, executive director of the BJE, would beg to differ.

"I don't think of it in those terms," said Epstein in a separate interview. "It seems to me it comes from families with different kinds of needs and approaches."

Rounding out the picture, he noted, "everyone understands that the whole idea of supplementary school is difficult. You're taking kids at a time when they should be free and imposing a curriculum on them. It's not a simple story. Supplementary schools have a kind of built-in problem. On the other hand, when they're good, they're very good. We have leadership who were raised in supplementary schools."

He believes strongly that supplementary Jewish schools can be a very positive force in Jewish education, he said.

The Ledbury school is currently negotiating with the BJE to become recognized by the organization. Neither the school nor the board foresees any obstacle to that process.

Although the BJE is in the process of re-examining its criteria, current criteria include a written curriculum, verifiable standards of learning, and a democratically chosen board comprised of "members in good standing of the Jewish community" (i.e. contributors to UJA Federation, which funds the BJE and its affiliates), Epstein said.

There is no minimum number of classroom hours, although a minimum of 100 hours per year of Judaic instruction is recommended, beginning at Grade 3.

Karen Valter, principal of the Ledbury school since its inception, is a psychometrist and special education teacher who has taught at a number of local Jewish day and supplementary schools. She says she is realistic about what can be taught in two hours a week.

"Conversational Hebrew is not included, because there just isn't time. We teach some vocabulary as it's relevant to the holidays and rituals. We teach high-frequency words that occur in the brachot and in the davening."

Valter, who is Orthodox, said she believes strongly that her curriculum is the best it can be for a two-hour-a-week school.

Her teachers are graduates of Beth Jacob Teachers' Seminary, and she stressed that their love of and commitment to Judaism is a very important component of the program. All the teachers, for example, invite their students to come to their sukkahs at Sukkot. "We want them to see that when we talk about building a sukkah and decorating it, we really do that."

As a parent, Morton Palter wants her children to be familiar with traditions and holidays and to be comfortable in a Jewish environment, particularly in a synagogue.

"They learn an amazing amount," she said.

At Pride of Israel Synagogue, an unaffiliated congregation with traditional Conservative-style services, Rabbi Robert Rhodes said that there is talk of re-evaluating the shul's policy that any halachically Jewish child may have a Saturday bar or bat mitzvah.

The reason, he said, is a "low level of performance" by some celebrants who don't have a minimum level of education.

But he himself makes a case for continuing the status quo. "You've got a chance to connect with people who [may] have no connection," he said. "Some of them join the shul and stay with us, and some of them don't."

School choice in the Orthodox community

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Parents who want an Orthodox education for their children no longer have to send them out of town, although many do so – to yeshivot in New York, Milwaukee, Cleveland or Pittsburgh, for instance. But the options right here are growing.

Leaving aside Associated Hebrew Schools, which, while offering a traditional Torah education, includes students from the entire spectrum of Jewish observance, parents have the choice of schools that run the gamut of Orthodoxy: Netivot and Bnei Akiva Schools for the centrist Orthodox, Eitz Chaim and Ner Israel for what might be called right-of-centre Orthodoxy, haredi schools like Beth Jacob Elementary School (known colloquially as Little Bais Yaakov), and Yesodei Hatorah.

Comment

The differences between the schools are not merely ones of curriculum. Rather, they are a reflection of specific worldviews.

Education in the Orthodox community is not seen as the transmission of facts, or or even the teaching of a body of information. Instead, it is the handing down and preservation of a whole way of life.

The implications are far-reaching, beginning with the admission policy. A school must decide whether to have a self-selecting policy; in other words, assume that only those in agreement with the school's philosophy will apply. However, this may not achieve the desired result.

What some schools are doing is to have a list of questions for the prospective student's family. Do they watch television? Do they go to movies? Does the mother cover her hair? What shul does the family attend? All these issues have a bearing on whether the child will fit in with the student body, and the ethos and culture that the school is trying to create.

It is important to note that the choice of school will also affect the choice of marriage partner, especially in the somewhat rarified atmosphere of shadchan-arranged matches.

The idea is to insulate the students from what Rabbi Akiva Stefansky, principal of Beth Jacob High School, has described as corrosive influences, those that will affect the moral compass of a student. The feeling is also strong that youngsters must be kept away from people who do not share similar views, Rabbi Stefansky has said.

Curriculum is also affected. The ratio of religious subjects to secular is a case in point. Schools seen as part of the centrist Orthodox stream give more or less equal weight to each, not only in time but in emphasis. Others try to integrate secular and Jewish studies whenever possible. For instance, the French Revolution would be taught, not only as it related to world history, but also as it affected the Jews, and Jewish practice in France.

Similarly, science courses, while usually based on Ministry of Education guidelines, may leave out topics such as evolution that are questionable according to a school's religious doctrine. English literature courses may feature expurgated versions of Shakespeare.

Secular studies become, to a greater or lesser degree, secondary to religious ones, not just in the amount of time spent on them, but in the seriousness with which the students – and their parents – approach them. This is particularly true in those schools that discourage students from going on to university, except for universities under strictly Orthodox auspices, such as Touro College.

These considerations are not capricious for the right-wing schools that apply them. The issue of Orthodox education must be seen, not through the eyes of the general community, but through the worldview of the haredim. The outside world and its values simply don't have either the appeal or the significance that they do for those beyond the confines of that community.

Since many schools have opened in recent years, parents face an increasingly difficult choice. New elementary schools include The Toronto Cheder (usually referred to as TTC), an expanding boys school, and Bais Bracha, a girls' school. Among the new high schools are Tiferet Bais Yaakov and Bnos Bais Yaakov, both for girls. Lubavitch now has a girls' high school, Bais Chomesh, as well as Bais Chaya Mushka for elementary age girls and Cheder Chabad for boys.

One of the more startling developments has been the move of the Hamilton yeshiva to Toronto, with its name changed to Darchei Torah.

Older schools are also going strong: Bais Yaakov, Ulpanat Orot and Or Chaim, Ner Israel, Eitz Chaim, Netivot, Or Menachem, Yesodei Hatorah and Or Ha'emet.

To make matters even more difficult for parents, the children, as is the case with all youngsters, may want to go to a particular school, not for ideological reasons, but because "all my friends are going there."

Special needs programs flourishing

Weir meets regularly with teachers, and together with a psychological educational consultant who comes in once a week, puts together an educational plan for the child.

An occupational and speech therapist also comes into the school, Weir says. The school also has some Israeli volunteers who offer students extra help. "These volunteers are not teachers but they are sometimes able to give the extra help a child needs."

Above all, it is important to be honest and up front with parents, Weir says. "We can modify and change their program, but if the child is not getting anywhere we have to make a decision and help parents find the right place for their child."

Ideally, every child should remain in their home school, Levine says, but for some students, the best solution may be to attend She'arim Hebrew Day School, a school for children with learning disabilities and/or attention deficit disorders, or Zareinu Educational and Therapeutic Centre, which offers educational and therapeutic services to children with physical and intellectual disabilities.

"These schools are seen as a continuum of service and they play an important role," says Levine. "There are few communities in the world that have such schools available."

Not just a minor experience

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

All around the city, everyone seems to be doing it – singles, parents and grandparents. And on almost every night of the week.

Adult Jewish education seems to be happening everywhere in our community. From lectures in packed auditoriums to intimate gatherings, formal and informal educational programs are taking place in learning centres, workplaces, homes and synagogues.

Jewish leaders point to several reasons behind the emergence of a vibrant adult Jewish learning environment in synagogues that is growing to meet the spiritual and intellectual needs of every segment of the community.

Rabbi Jay Kelman at Beth Jacob Synagogue believes the overall increase in learning is due to an awareness that being Jewish means being a knowledgeable Jew.

The generation that arrived in Toronto after the war had to focus on learning a new language and earning a living for their families, Rabbi Kelman said. The community has now matured and begun to focus on the role of education.

"Jewish education is in," Rabbi Kelman noted, pointing to the increase in enrolment in day schools across the city.

This has resulted in the merging of several factors – graduates of the many day schools are searching for greater depth in their lives in a city filled with wonderful teachers, Rabbi Kelman added.

"And we have a 4,000-year-old tradition that offers a lot of meaning that has been expressed in a way that modern people can appreciate."

Pray and Learn sessions at many synagogues offer alternatives to the more communal prayer settings.

At Beth Jacob Synagogue, people come together in a small beit midrash and discuss the week's Torah portion.

"It's informal, participatory and interactive, because people don't want to be simply spectators anymore," Rabbi Kelman said.

Daph Yomi programs, which exist in many Orthodox shuls as well as in small shtieblach, focus learners on a different page of the Talmud every day. According to Rabbi Kelman, the number of daph yomi programs is growing – with approximately 40 lessons taking place in the city every day.

There is also an increase in the number of Orthodox programs directed at women, Rabbi Kelman said.

"There is no doubt that one of the burning issues in traditional Judaism is the attitudes towards women and women's learning.

"With the changing status of women in our general community, it's important to recognize that women want more meaning in Jewish life and that if Torah is the basis of being a Jew, then women also want to be actively Jewish."

Some feel that including women may be detrimental to family structures, Rabbi Kelman said. "But if women can be doctors, lawyers and CEOs, why should they be ignorant in Judaism?"

Whether Orthodox, Conservative, Reform or Reconstructionist, any Torah learning is great, Rabbi Kelman said.

"Learning is an act of Jewish engagement and the important thing is acknowledging, as Maimonides said, that no one people has a monopoly on truth."

Holy Blossom Temple rabbi John Moscowitz attributes the growth in Jewish learning to a greater understanding that Judaism is a "very serious business."

In addition, there is a feeling in the community that the Jewish people are entering very difficult times, Rabbi Moscowitz said. The violence in Israel, the events in Durban and the attacks of Sept. 11 have shaken up the community, resulting in a need to come together for major public events to hear intellectuals articulate their views of the world.

"The fact that all members of the community are joining to hear lectures on a wide variety of subjects shows that Jews, whether they're Orthodox, Conservative or Reform, want to feel part of Klal Yisrael."

"They also want reality named," Rabbi Moscowitz said. "In difficult times, there is less tolerance for fooling ourselves. People start to turn to things that have more depth."

In meeting the needs of those who look for Judaic understanding, learning has to respond to the beginner as well as the more advanced, he noted.

It is also important, he said, to offer classes that portray all aspects of Jewish heritage because there is a growing awareness that people can find a way to open the door into Judaism through other means besides ritual – such as study, prayer or Zionism.

The important thing is that they eventually come in, Rabbi Moscowitz said.

Rabbi Wayne Allen at Beth Tikvah Synagogue pointed out that in addition to large lectures and a growth in chavurot and informal study groups, there is also an increasing demand on rabbis to be teachers.

"There are many people who want to study and they approach me because they want individual attention. It's become important to customize adult Jewish education to reach out to as many people as possible."

Rabbi Allen said older people are also contributing to the current increase in the demand for education.

It's important, he said, to be attentive to the needs of older people because they have more free time on their hands and are participating in study groups in greater numbers.

On the other hand, Rabbi Allen said, the greatest challenge right now is bringing in younger people who are more critical and selective about which programs they'll attend.

Book remembers Alberta's Jewish war veterans

BY TAMARA STECYK
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — Val Rimer has seen his 20-year-old dream fulfilled by having the stories of the Jewish war veterans of southern Alberta captured in a new book.

Memories on the March, a 140-page book written by Tyler Trafford, illustrates the personal experiences of southern Alberta military veterans.

"We were concerned that the memories and experiences of the veterans would be lost," said Rimer, commander of the Calgary post of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada (JWVC). "That concern has been translated into this book."

After meeting some of the veterans, Trafford, a non-Jew with no military knowledge prior to researching the book with Rimer, realized the project was a unique opportunity for a writer.

"For a lot of veterans, this is the last chance to tell their story. The book itself became a stick that was poking up all these memories that would otherwise not have come out," he said.

At times, the interview process was emotional for both Trafford and the veterans. Many of the Jewish veterans had locked out their war experiences and the interview opened a door that had been closed for more than 50 years.

"Some of them cried about what happened," said Trafford. "It's not been just a book. It's been an experience. It's changed my attitude about veterans and Jewish people completely."

Trafford and Rimer gathered names of about 450 Jewish veterans in southern Alberta, and in the process, they made some interesting discoveries. Rimer learned of stories he had never heard from members of the post. Trafford found a complete manuscript by a Russian immigrant, Reuven Smushkevich, when he spoke to Smushkevich's daughter, Polina, about the project.

"It's a complete life story of a military veteran that was unearthed because of this. It would have never appeared otherwise," said Trafford.

While writing Memories on the March, Trafford made a point of telling stories about everyday people.

"It's stories about what it was like to be Jewish in the military," he explained.

"This is not a book about charging up a hill with bayonets loaded and being a hero in that action," added Rimer.

"Ten per cent of Canada's Jewish population enlisted in the military during the Second World War, which was the highest rate of involvement of any ethnic group in the country," he said.

Many of the Jewish soldiers at the time were not aware of the Nazi plan, but even when they were, they kept a Hebrew designation on their dog tags.

"You really did not want to be captured wearing that. But it did not bother them," Trafford said.

Memories on the March also tells stories about others, including one about a peacekeeper and another about volunteers who fought in Israel's War of Independence. Not all the veterans in the book were born and raised in southern Alberta; they may have immigrated to the area following the war or lived in a town or city in the area for a few years before moving to another part of the country.

Trafford could not write a story about every veteran. "What we aimed to do was to get stories that were very representative so it didn't really matter that we didn't get everyone. We have one person's story in one way or another," he said. "This book isn't really a military record. It was written in a very non-military way."

Both Trafford and Rimer hope Memories on the March will be read across the country, especially by children and grandchildren of the veterans.

"It's the only one of its type in Canada. We are so proud of this book, and that this book should be across the country," said Rimer.

"I didn't know there were Jewish veterans. People don't associate with that. There's probably so much focus on the Holocaust that sometimes it's easy to overlook that there were all these men and women in the military," Trafford added.

Copies of Memories on the March can be obtained by calling the Jewish War Veterans at 403-255-5305.

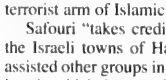
As terrorists connect, a true call for peace?

According to Reports



By PAUL MICHAELS

Two items this week:

Under the title "'I want to have the honour of becoming a martyr,'" Matthew Kalman writes from the West Bank town of Jenin about Ali Safouri, a 39-year-old father of four. Safouri commands the Sarayeh (Brigades) on the West Bank, defined by Kalman as "the terrorist arm of Islamic Jihad" (Ottawa Citizen, Feb. 26).

Safouri "takes credit for a string of recent attacks in the Israeli towns of Hadera and Afula and says he has assisted other groups in carrying out shootings and bombings in which dozens of Israelis have been killed and hundreds injured," Kalman writes.

Kalman then quotes Safouri as he boasts: "'I meet with young men and encourage them to carry out martyrdom attacks. I feel very proud when I see these young men prepared to sacrifice their lives and turn their bodies into shrapnel as a weapon against the enemy.'"

What is most revealing in Kalman's report is Safouri's admission that he co-ordinates with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's Fatah group "in all matters." With rare exceptions, the western media have not examined the nature of this co-operation.

The motivation that links Islamic Jihad and Hamas to Fatah merits closer attention. In the New Republic, Israeli journalist Isabel Kershner writes that Marwan Barghouti, head of Fatah's Tanzim West Bank militia, "has developed a working relationship with Hamas through the grassroots Unified Committee of Nationalistic and Islamic Forces, and has held joint press conferences with West Bank Hamas political leader Sheikh HassanYousef" (Feb. 18).

While Safouri justifies his violence against Israeli civilians as a means of non-terrorist defence of his homeland, Kalman refers to Safouri's colleague, Mahmoud Jawalbeh, who was more blunt. While Israel exists, Jawalbeh argues, there can never be peace.

The second item concerns Saudi Arabia. As of this writing, an unofficial offer of a broad Arab peace with Israel, in exchange for an Israeli withdrawal to the June 1967 lines, is being evaluated by all parties.

This may represent a genuine breakthrough in Saudi foreign policy. However, it may also be just a clever PR manoeuvre designed to corner Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in world opinion and assuage U.S. anger about the 15 Saudi nationals involved in the Sept. 11 attacks.

A very informative documentary about Saudi Arabia ran on CBC Radio's "This Morning – Sunday" on Feb. 24. Host Michael Enright noted: "With the demise of the Taliban in Afghanistan, Saudi Arabia is the most conservatively Islamic nation in the world... It remains the home, the inspiration and the underwriter of militant Islamic fanaticism. And now, it may not even have that stable a government."

The documentary disclosed numerous details about the ties between the fanatical Wahhabi clerics who revile Jews – and Christians – and reject any notion of a Jewish presence on "Islamic holy land," and the Saudi royal family. This relationship, as well as the traditional hostility of Saudi Arabia towards Israel, makes one wonder how sincere any peace offer can be. We may soon find out.

Paul Michaels is director of communications with the Canada-Israel Committee.

Hamilton mourns loss of community leader

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — The community is mourning the loss of one of its leaders, Sam Lax, who died recently at the age of 86.

Lax was born in Hamilton, one of five children of parents from eastern Europe. His father was a rag and scrap dealer in the city's east end, and Lax left school at 16 to help work in the family business.

Described by his son Ted as a man who was "larger than life, and who ran on energy," Lax left a lasting legacy to the Jewish community to which he was committed, and to the city he loved and vowed never to leave.

Lax was involved in several community organizations in the 1950s and 1960s. He was a founding member of the building fund for Beth Jacob Synagogue and served as membership chair. He was also a founding member of the Beverly Golf and Country Club, intended for Jewish members at a time when they were not welcomed by existing clubs in the city.

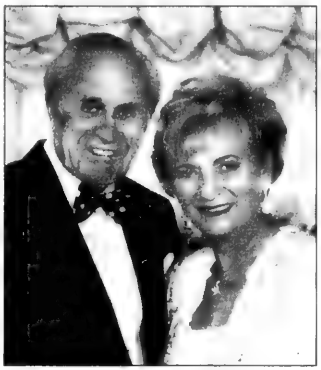
He was chair of the Jewish Welfare Fund (the precursor to the UJA and Jewish Social Services) and part of a small group that inaugurated Hamilton's annual Negev Dinner in 1953, which today is a major fund-raiser for the Jewish National Fund. He himself declined to be the honoree until his "bar mitzvah year" in 1966 – marking 13 years of involvement with the organization. When it was announced that he would be the honoree, those in the community who knew him remarked that it couldn't happen to a nicer guy.

Lax was also invited to join the board of St Joseph's Villas seniors' home, run by Catholic nuns, becoming its first Jewish member.

He was known for being open to ideas and for treating everyone with equal respect – "from the president of a steel mill to the guy loading scrap into a trailer," said Ted in an interview. Aside from his sense of humour and infectious laugh, Lax's kindness was also legendary.

Ted recalled two particular incidents.

"My dad loved to play the Hatikvah on his violin, and on one occasion, a friend asked to borrow the instrument. It was somehow never returned, and as time went on, my wife Bonnie and I decided to get him a replacement.



Sam and Sally Lax

"Not long after, my father was out for lunch at a local hotel he frequented when a waitress serving him happened to mention that she wanted to give her son music lessons but could not afford to buy him a violin. My dad went straight home and brought back his to give her as a gift."

One particular kindness shaped the course of Lax's career. In 1945, he started his own scrap metal company, originally called Lax Brothers, which in 1964, became Lax Iron & Steel Co. Ltd. One day that winter, he was driving to St. Catharines when he saw a stranded motorist in a broken-down car. He pulled over to help, and when the man asked to be taken to a meeting at a plant, Lax agreed to drive him there.

The man turned out to be the president of Fleet Manufacturing, a Fort Erie aircraft company, and as they parted, he told Lax to come back in two weeks. Lax was then given his first scrap account. Fleet's company president told him he trusted him, and on the strength of his kind deed, sent several key accounts his way. One of those accounts included the scrapping of the Avro Arrow. The Diefenbaker government had decided to scrap the series of supersonic fighter jets and Lax's crews dismantled completed planes and those in production, heeding the directive that every piece be smelted down.

Lax brought his brother Sheridan into the business and the company later diversified into machine tools and real estate. In the 1950s, the brothers bought water lots from the Hamilton Harbour Commission and added landfill from other construction sites to make them into useable land. Initially, Lax dreamed of building a residential waterfront development on the bay, but the city bought back the 70 acres and developed the land into Bayfront Park, which opened in 1993.

Of all his achievements, though, Lax was proudest of his family. He and wife Sally, who is from Regina, met when she came to Hamilton for her brother's wedding. She was 19; he was 28. They had five dates in 10 days.

"We got engaged on the Labour Day weekend, and were married just over two months after we'd met," his wife Sally said in an interview. "Everyone said our marriage wouldn't last because I was so young."

But the couple were happily married for 56 years. Ever the romantic, Lax would send Sally a dozen roses for birthdays, especially special occasions, "and sometimes in between," she said.

"He was a gentleman and always treated me like a lady, opening doors for me, that sort of thing. Even when he was sick in his final days in a Florida hospital, he charmed the nurses, and when the doctor came in, Sam asked him how he was. The doctor was a little surprised, but thanked him for asking all the same.

"He loved people," said Sally, "and he loved life."

In addition to his wife Sally and his son Ted, Lax leaves three grandchildren – Sandra, Richard and Bobby.

Canada abstains on key UN anti-racism vote

Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance." It was adopted by a vote of 137 to two (Israel and the U.S. voted against), with two abstentions (Canada and Australia).

Canadian Jewish Congress had asked Canada to vote against the measure, but CJC last week had some praise for Ottawa's consistent stand.

Canada issued a strongly-worded explanation of its abstention, repeating that it was "deeply disappointed" by the Durban conference, which was "inexcusably marred by unacceptable references to the Middle East... We regret that time and energy that should have been dedicated to the eradication of racism was squandered."

Canada said it wished to reiterate that it disassociates itself "integrally from all references in the Durban Declaration and programme of action directly or indirectly relating to the Middle East."

While some of the Durban conference's so-called "outcome documents" contain "helpful language" in the fight against racism, and while Canada remains committed to the fight against all forms of racial discrimination, this country "continues to have serious concerns about both the Durban process as well as its outcome documents. That is why Canada abstained on the follow-up to the WCAR," the explanation said.

In a letter last week to Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham, CJC asked Canada to oppose the resolution, consistent with its reservations expressed at the end of the Durban conference.

CJC national president Keith Landy said in the letter it would be "difficult to see" how Canada could support a resolution that endorses the WCAR's final draft and "expresses satisfaction" with the conference's outcome, and which calls for "full implementation" of all its recommendations.

But CJC conceded that the Canadian delegation played a constructive role in improving the resolution's language from its original draft form.

"We would have preferred they vote 'no,' but we commend the Canadian government for going as far as it did," Landy told The CJN. Ottawa's explanation of its vote "is an excellent statement, under the circumstances."

CJC was also pleased that the language in another resolution passed by the UN was altered from an earlier draft to include anti-Semitism as a form of racism.

In the first version, drafted last November, the UN called on member states to examine "contemporary forms" of racism as they relate to "Africans and people of African descent, Arabs, Muslims and Jews."

Congress wanted "anti-Semitism" substituted for "Jews."

Not using the term anti-Semitism "is a retrograde step for its downplays the true nature of anti-Jewish animosity," Landy wrote to Graham. "Merely condemning discrimination against 'Jews' does not reflect the historical phenomena of anti-Semitism as millennia-old hatred and persecution of the Jewish people. As the oldest and hardiest strain of the racism virus, anti-Semitism is on a quantitatively different plane from other examples cited.

"We respectfully ask the government of Canada to seek to change these resolutions to once again refer specifically to anti-Semitism."

The revised resolution complies, and urges a continued battle against racism, including on behalf of "Africans and people of African descent, xenophobia, Negrophobia, Islamophobia/anti-Muslim, anti-Semitism and related intolerance."

The resolution, dealing with measures to combat contemporary forms of racism, passed without a vote, as did a third resolution on fighting racism and racial discrimination.

Also last week, CJC presented a brief to the department of foreign affairs in Ottawa that urges Canada to vote against any anti-Israel resolutions expected at the annual meeting of the UN's Commission on Human Rights, scheduled to begin in Geneva next week.

The CJN will follow the story as the conference gets underway.

Israel's security cabinet keeps military pressure on PA

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The security cabinet met last Sunday night to discuss Israel's response to the most recent wave of terror attacks.

When the meeting convened by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon concluded, it was reported that the cabinet had approved a plan by the Israel Defence Forces to apply continuous military pressure on the Palestinian Authority (PA) and terrorist organizations. The purpose of the plan is to put an end to Palestinian terror. The plan, details of which were not released, was unanimously approved by the cabinet.

A total of 21 Israelis were killed in four attacks over a period of less than 24 hours last weekend. Nine people were killed and many others injured, including women and children, in a suicide bombing in the haredi neighbourhood of Beit Yisrael in Jerusalem, following services on Saturday evening. The bomber was identified as a 19-year-old man from the Dehaishe refugee camp near Bethlehem.

Ten Israelis were killed and four injured in a shooting attack Sunday morning at an IDF roadblock north of the West Bank city of Ramallah, near the settlement of Ofra.

Also on Sunday, an Israeli soldier was killed and four others wounded in a shooting attack near the Kissufim Crossing between Israel and the Gaza Strip.

The Al-Aqsa Brigades, the military wing of PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement, claimed responsibility for the attacks.

Dozens of Israelis demonstrated Sunday evening outside the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem where the cabinet meeting took place, Channel 1 reported. They called for the government to take harsher measures against the PA, and some held signs with photographs of Arafat and Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

Sharon and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer disagreed Saturday night on the appropriate Israeli response to the latest wave of Palestinian terror attacks.

Sharon wanted an order issued to tighten Arafat's confinement in Ramallah and return the tanks to their positions around his office there. But Ben-Eliezer opposed the move and was able to delay any intensification of the siege around the Palestinian leader's compound. The defence minister believes Israel needs to give Arafat back his freedom of movement, at least within the territories, but the prime minister is opposed to this.

During the weekly cabinet meeting Sunday morning, Sharon said Israel must maintain its pressure on Arafat and the PA.

'Intensive operations against Arafat' will continue

"We need to continue our intensive operations against Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority. If no real pressure is applied, it will be difficult to hold any kind of negotiations," he said.

Sharon also denied that the recent attacks were in response to IDF operations in the territories, adding that anyone who made a connection between the two had "political motives" for doing so.

Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres spoke of the need for dialogue and progress on the understandings he reached with Palestinian legislative council speaker Abu Ala. "We have to give hope to the 3.5 million Palestinians," Peres said.

Ben-Eliezer praised the IDF for its operations in the West Bank refugee camps of Balata and Jenin. "We proved that we are not deterred from entering any focal point of terror," he said. "The operations are a success and we will continue to operate every place where there are terrorists."

Sharon spoke about the security areas he had mentioned in his speech to the nation on Feb. 21. He said the areas would comprise a strip of varying width of several kilometres for the duration of any interim agreement.

"This is what is required as long as there is no real agreement and no final settlement," he said, adding that he believes it is impossible to reach a final settlement within a short time, and that at present the Palestinians also prefer an interim agreement.

Shin Bet head Avi Dichter said at the cabinet meeting that Arafat "is detached from reality and sees things with a much less dismal perspective than do his close associates."

Tanzim and Fatah continue to lead in carrying out terror attacks, Dichter said, but PA security forces are not participating in the fight. If they do join the struggle, "this would be a serious campaign," he said.

In related developments, six Palestinians, including three children, were killed Monday afternoon when an IDF tank fired on two vehicles in Ramallah.

Palestinian sources reported the strike was a botched Israeli assassination attempt on Hamas activist, Abu Kweik, whose wife and three children were among the dead. The sources also said that Abu Kweik was not in either of the vehicles at the time of the explosion.

The Palestinian Authority head of security in the West Bank, Jibril Rajoub, said a pickup truck was hit by two tank shells fired from the nearby settlement of Psagot.

An IDF source said the blast was an assassination attempt on two armed Palestinians in the area, but the shell had hit the civilians in error.

Abu Kweik is a member of the Hamas military wing in the al-Amari refugee camp in Ramallah.

Israel blocks construction of disputed Nazareth mosque

By ORI NIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Construction of the Shihab al-Din mosque, close to the Basilica of the Annunciation in Nazareth, will not go ahead, the Sharon government decided Sunday.

Sharon's cabinet adopted a recommendation submitted by a special ministerial committee headed by Housing and Construction Minister Natan Sharansky. The recommendation reverses the policies on the issue enacted by the Netanyahu and Barak governments.

Police in the northern district have been preparing for possible violence sparked by the decision, but Arab leaders do not anticipate such a reaction.

The square in Nazareth has become a source of tension between Christian and Muslim leaders and groups because of differing interpretations of its historic and spiritual importance. Muslims believe that Shihab al-Din, cousin of Arab hero Saladin, is buried in the area of the square. Christians believe the basilica is where the angel Gabriel told Mary she would give birth to Jesus.

Sharon's cabinet passed the no-construction decision by a resounding majority. Only Science, Culture and Sport Minister Matan Vilnai voted against it; two other Labor party ministers (Minister without Portfolio Ra'anan Cohen and Agriculture Minister Shalom Simhon) abstained.

The main points of the decision are:

- No mosque is to be built on the controversial square in Nazareth.
- The government proposes to the Waqf (Muslim religious trust) seven alternative sites for the mosque, some of them close to the disputed square, and all of them available for immediate building.
- The government offers to restore the structure which holds Shihab al-Din's grave in concordance with Muslim needs and sensibilities, but without altering the site's status.
- The government supports the Nazareth municipality's original plan (which it approved six years ago), calling for the square to become an open tourist site.

Waqf leaders in Nazareth and prominent figures from Israel's Islamic movement responded angrily to the government's decision, but Vatican representatives in Israel said it is "bold and wise."

Rejecting accusations that his committee acted on a preconceived plan to block the mosque's construction, Sharansky said on Sunday that his panel "did very serious work, comparing and deliberating the various claims, and consulting experts."

In an interview, Sharansky said there are two main reasons why his committee repealed the recommendations of the Netanyahu and Barak governments.

First, he said, the Muslims "have not abided by all the understandings reached with them in the past." They failed to remove a protest tent, thus violating government orders, and they set a cornerstone and started work on the mosque without obtaining the required building permits, Sharansky charged.

Also, Sharansky said, the past government committees did not give appropriate weight to Christian sensibilities on this issue and particularly the Vatican's position.

Sharansky added that he asked Israeli President Moshe Katsav, who led the ministerial committee on the dispute under the Netanyahu government, how the decision was reached. According to Sharansky, Katsav said his committee relied on Nazareth Mayor Ramez Jaraisy as sole spokesperson for the Christian view. The Barak government panel was headed by Shlomo Ben-Ami and depended largely on the Katsav committee's work, Sharansky said.

Arens skeptical of Saudi peace plan

Asked if the plan has any redeeming features, Arens replied, "It might be a microscopic move in the right direction."

He added that "if there is a positive spin here, the Saudis have made a move that is not hostile to Israel."

Arens would not speculate whether the plan is a public relations ploy designed to burnish Saudi Arabia's image since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in the United States.

Turning to a different topic, Arens said the Palestinian uprising will intensify if the Palestinians continue to think they can achieve political gains through violence.

Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, he said, bases his strategy on that assumption. "He is a man of violence."

Arguing that the intifadah can be crushed militarily, Arens said, "There is only a military solution. We're dealing with a war, our task is to win it, and I think we will."

Arens, who was once Israel's defence minister, added: "You have to go after the sources of violence. You can't win this war by remote control."

Israel, he said, must be prepared to launch raids into Palestinian towns in Area A, territory fully controlled by the Palestinians.

"In principle, we're prepared to fight as long as it takes," he said, referring to the goal of eradicating terrorism. "We have the ability to end the violence in a reasonably short period."

Taking a swipe at Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's tactics in confronting the intifadah, Arens said, "This government has been hesitant. It didn't do a year ago what it's doing now."

Israel and the Palestinians can resume talks after the violence has been suppressed, Arens said.

Advising Israel not to negotiate under fire, Arens declared Israel will not be "brought to its knees" by violence.

Asked whether he agrees with Sharon that Arafat is "irrelevant," Arens said, 'It's not an appropriate terminology. Arafat has influence. I wish he were irrelevant. He's relevant."

On another topic, Arens said Israel should retaliate if Iraq fires Scud missiles at Israel again. (During the 1991 Gulf War, Israel did not strike back after being pummelled by 39 Iraqi Scuds.)

"Israel should certainly not take [an attack] lying down. There is no reason why Israel should not hit back."

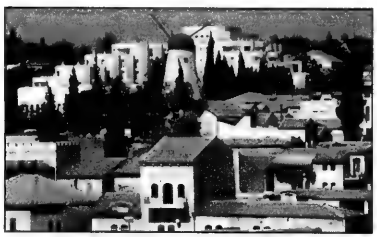
Jerusalem's Island of Serenity

It's not really an island, but it might as well be. On a map, it's where central Jerusalem's Keren Hayesod, Ze'ev Jabotinsky and David Hamelech streets meet. In spirit, it's a world away from the buzz and bustle of Israel's populous capital.



Welcome to Yemin Moshe! Quaint, quiet and picturesque – established in 1891 – it was the first neighbourhood to be built outside Jerusalem's Old City walls, thanks to Sir Moses Montefiore. A Zionist, long before the word became common, Montefiore purchased the land on which Yemin Moshe now stands in 1855, with funds bequeathed by Judah Touro, an American Jewish merchant. Two years later, Montefiore erected an 18 metre steam-powered windmill, Yemin Moshe's most famous landmark, to grind grain so the poor could purchase cheaper flour. Today, the windmill houses a memorial museum for Montefiore, who made seven visits to what is now Israel – the last, when he was 91 years old.

So what makes Yemin Moshe, which deteriorated under Jordanian rule until 1967, a planet apart from worldly endeavours? It's lightly populated with fewer than 150 charmingly restored and renovated houses. Its residents are warm and welcoming. The spiritual peace of the Old City, which Yemin Moshe faces, pervades the neighbourhood. And it's a haven for talented artists and musicians, who often visit Yemin Moshe's placid surroundings from other parts of the world. Perfect ingredients for a peaceful passage from urban life.

Next week: Katzrin captures the flavour of Talmudic times.

TRADITIONS ABOUND

In some ways, Passover traditions differ worldwide.

While Ashkenazi Jews are forbidden to eat rice throughout Passover week, it is a staple for Sephardi Jews.

For Ashkenazi Jews, matzah balls are an essential part of chicken soup; to some Arabic Jews, they are an unheard of entity.

Charoset also varies widely. There are sweet mixtures with apples and nuts, recipes with dates, and other recipes with pomegranates or lemon rind.

Some of us have eggs and salt water at our seder table, while others have potatoes. Some use horseradish for bitter herbs, while others use romaine lettuce.

Despite our differences, however, we all gather with our family and friends at the seder table and we all retell the story of the liberation of the Jews from slavery.

We also revel in our own family traditions. Often, the same person leads the seder, the same child says the Four Questions, and the same person opens the door for Eliyahu.

Food plays an important part in those traditions. Whether we serve turkey, fish or chicken as a main course, or candied carrots, sweet potato tsimmes or potato kugel as side dishes, we are no doubt serving similar foods to those that graced the seder tables of our mothers and grandmothers.

Some of us want to start our own food traditions, however, and we search for new recipes to enhance our seder meal.

At The CJN, we've tried to make that search easier. We've provided you with some CJN staff favourites, as well as some recipes from around the world.

We've also tried to make Passover week easier by printing recipes for dishes to try when you just need something different.

Whether you're making your first seder or you're thinking that next year you may pass the job of hosting the seder down to the next generation, we have tried to provide you with some recipes that could become a family tradition.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy your Passover meals, and Chag kasher v'samayach.

Passover Food Ideas

Potato takes creative stage

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

For the humble potato, taken for granted all year and rarely on centre stage, Passover is a week in the spotlight. Without competition from pasta or – unless you're Sephardi – legumes, beans, corn or rice, for eight glorious days, the potato reigns supreme.

We cook potatoes almost by instinct, the same way, over and over. Yet with the possible exception of chocolate, name another food you can eat every day and never tire of!

Determined this Pesach to find new and interesting ways to serve potatoes, I consulted cookbook editor Roy Finamore, who, with Molly Stevens of Fine Cooking magazine, has written the encyclopedic, lusciously photographed One Potato, Two Potato (Houghton Mifflin), the quintessential guide to everything you ever wanted to know about the vegetable.

Finamore, who has worked with Martha Stewart, Mexican cooking authority Diana Kennedy, Ina Garten (of Barefoot Contessa fame) and Anne Willan, teamed up with Stevens, who was classically trained in the art of French cooking at the famed La Varenne and author of Williams-Sonoma New England. Together they cooked 1,500 pounds of potatoes, testing 20 varieties, and offering 300 mouth-watering recipes from appetizers, soups and salads to main courses and even desserts.

So first we shop. Are your mashed potatoes gummy? Your French fries soggy? Your potato salad mushy? Maybe you're using the wrong potato. Finamore explains the difference between high-starch potatoes, like Idahos and russets, which more readily absorb liquids and seasonings (therefore better for mashing and baking), and low-starch or "waxy" potatoes, like white boiling potatoes and round reds, which, being more dense and moist, will turn to glue if overworked. Instead of mashing, boil them or roast them – any preparation where you want them to hold their shape. "Think of potato salads and hash browns," says Finamore.

How to tell if a potato is high-starch or low-starch? Here's a great trick: "Cut a raw potato in half with a large chef's knife; if there is a lot of white residue on the blade and if the potato seems to cling to the knife, it's starchy. If the potato leaves little residue on the blade and falls away from the knife without clinging, it's most likely waxy."

By the way, don't be confused by the term "new potatoes," which, strictly speaking, refers to any variety that is within 15 days of digging and is therefore available only in late spring and summer. Often stores mislabel red or white potatoes as "new." "If you can easily rub the skin off the potato with your thumb, it's not a real new potato," notes Finamore.

Once you get them home, store potatoes in a cool, dark place, but never in the refrigerator, which will cause the starches to convert to sugar and sabotage your recipes.

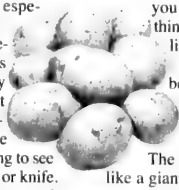
Now for the tools. You'll need a sharp peeler. "I like the Y-shaped peelers because they strip a wider swath," says Finamore, "but Molly prefers the old-fashioned swivel peeler because she likes the way you can use the pointed tip to dig out any eyes or blemishes."

Finamore urges us – no, begs us – to purchase a ricer and a mandoline. For the silkiest mashed potatoes, only a ricer will do. A hand masher is second best, but unless you want glue, avoid the food mill. Just be sure to get a ricer with a solid basket, Finamore warns, not one with a removable plate, which gets stuck to the plunger and has to be pulled out and readjusted with each stroke. "It's an annoyance you can do without," she says.

A mandoline is essential for cutting thin, even slices for knock-out shoestring fries and gratins, and it beats the best knife for ease of slicing. Don't be put off by the high-roller price tag you see in gourmet kitchen stores. Finamore assures us that a serviceable mandoline can be had for around $30 (US).

Now, to scrub or not to scrub. Thicker skinned potatoes like russets can take a good scrubbing without damaging the skin, but be gentle with the thinner skinned varieties. Either way, use a vegetable brush with stiff bristles. Save your kitchen scrub sponge for your pots.

When boiling potatoes, think "steady simmer" rather than violent boiling, and here's a great tip for draining. Instead of throwing the potatoes in a colander (as we all do!) which crushes the potatoes on the bottom and causes them to cool unevenly, use a wire rack or a basket that fits over the sink, and spread the potatoes out in a single layer. This is especially important for making potato salad.



Remember, too, that cooking times will vary depending on the season. Freshly dug potatoes take less time to cook than older storage potatoes. The variety you choose and the size of your chunks will affect cooking times too, so adjust your recipes accordingly. Cut potatoes into similar sizes and cook the same varieties together, advises Finamore, and when testing to see if they're done, use a thin skewer rather than a fork or knife.

For the silkiest mashed potatoes, after boiling, put them back in the pan for about a minute to dry them, stirring with a wooden spoon.

Heat the cream (or milk if you choose) and add it slowly as you beat in each addition. Beat a little longer than you think you should. This will make your mashed potatoes lighter and ready to take more liquid.

Duchess potatoes are dried and riced the same way, beaten with egg and piped with a pastry bag for a dramatic presentation. Finamore says salmon or halibut may be substituted for the cod in the recipe below.

Just select skinless fillets 1 to 1½ inches thick.

The Mushroom and Spinach Stuffed Potato Galette is like a giant stuffed latke, crunchy on the outside with a delicious vegetable filling.

More than one way to cook potatoes

The Gingered Sweet Potato Pie with Meringue is a twist on your grandmother's marshmallow topped casserole. "Sautéed pears add a sweet note without making these candied," says Finamore. "It's a gorgeous holiday side dish."

DILLED COD WITH DUCHESS POTATOES

Duchess Potatoes:

2 lbs. russet potatoes, peeled and cut into chunks
coarse salt
6 tbsp. (¾ stick) unsalted butter, softened
1 large egg, lightly beaten
2 large egg yolks
freshly ground white pepper
pinch of freshly grated nutmeg
1 large egg, beaten, for an egg wash (optional)

Put the potatoes in a large saucepan, cover with cold water by at least an inch, add a good pinch of salt, and bring to a boil. Cover partway, reduce the heat to medium, and cook until the potatoes are tender. Drain the potatoes, return them to the pot and put them back over the heat to dry. Shake the pan and stir until the potatoes are floury and have made a film on the bottom of the pan.

Put the potatoes through a ricer and return them to the pot. Stir in the butter. Beat in the whole egg and the 2 yolks. Season with salt, white pepper and nutmeg.

Dilled Cod:

4 tbsp. (½ stick) unsalted butter, softened
1½ tbsp. chopped fresh dill
1 large egg, beaten with 1 tsp. water, for an egg wash
1 shallot, finely chopped
1½-2 lbs. thick cod fillets
coarse salt and freshly ground black pepper

1-2 tbsp. dry white wine or fresh lemon juice
sprigs of curly parsley for garnish

Heat the oven to 400. Butter a large ovenproof serving platter. Combine the butter and dill, whipping with a fork; set aside.

Fit a pastry bag with a large star tip and fill the bag with the duchess potatoes. Pipe a thick border about 1 inch high, around the edge of the platter. Brush the potatoes with the egg wash – lightly, so you don't ruin your piping.

Scatter the shallot over the bottom of the platter. Arrange the fillets on top, tucking under any thin tail or belly pieces so that the fillets are an even thickness. The fillets should be lightly touching each other but not overlapping. Season the fish with salt and pepper. Dot the tops of the fillets generously with the dill butter. Splash on about a tablespoon of the white wine.

Bake until the potatoes are just beginning to turn golden on the edges and the fish is cooked through, 20 to 25 minutes.

The garni du jour for this dish could only be sprigs of curly parsley. Serve from the platter.

MUSHROOM-AND-SPINACH-STUFFED POTATO GALETTE

Galettes are crunchy, hot cakes, a clever means to use up odd bits of leftovers. Once you've got the hang of making a stuffed galette, you might try your hand at other combinations. Any filling ingredients should be cooked (with the exception of tender-leafed vegetables such as baby spinach or fresh sorrel), and the filling should never overwhelm the potatoes. When we're feeling especially brave, we may add ⅓ cup or so of shredded cheese, but be forewarned, this can lead to trouble and make the galette stick to the pan. We're grateful to chef Randall Price for this recipe.

6 tbsp. (¾ stick) unsalted butter
½ lb. mushrooms (a combination of button and chanterelle is nice), trimmed and sliced coarse salt and freshly ground black pepper
1 shallot, minced
2 lbs. white or all-purpose potatoes, peeled
2 cups loosely packed tender spinach leaves, any tough stems removed

Melt 2 tbsp. of the butter in a skillet over medium-high heat. Add the mushrooms, season with salt and pepper, and sauté, shaking and stirring often, until browned and very dry, about 10 minutes. Add the shallot and cook for another minute. Remove from the heat and set aside.

Get creative with potatoes

Grate the potatoes with the fine julienne blade of a mandoline or the large holes of a box grater. Toss the shreds with salt and pepper to taste.

Heat 3 tbsp. of the butter in a 10-inch cast-iron or heavy, non-stick skillet over medium-high heat. When the butter is very hot – it will stop foaming – dump in half of the potatoes. Flatten them a bit with your hand and cover with the sautéed mushrooms. Top with the spinach leaves. Cover with the remaining potatoes and press hard on top with a flexible metal spatula to form a large pancake. Cook, continuing to compress with the spatula, until the cake is browned on the bottom and holding together, about 10 minutes. If it appears to be browning too quickly, lower the heat a smidgen – if you cook the galette at too high a heat, the potatoes inside won't cook through. During the last few minutes, use the spatula to loosen the galette and peek underneath to make sure that it's not sticking.

You have two options for flipping the galette: either lift and tilt the pan, and slide the galette onto a large flat plate, or set a large round plate over the skillet, and quickly flip the whole ensemble. Whichever method you choose, loosen any stuck bits of potato in the pan before continuing.

Add the remaining 1 tbsp. butter to the pan. Flip the galette and slide it back into the pan, browned side up, to cook on the other side. Cook, loosening the cake with the spatula and shaking back and forth to make sure that there's no sticking for 8 to 10 minutes, until browned on the bottom.

Cut into wedges and serve warm. Serves 6.

GINGERED SWEET POTATO PUDDING WITH MERINGUE

½ cup sliced almonds, very lightly toasted*
3 lbs. sweet potatoes, baked until very tender
3 tbsp. unsalted butter
2 ripe comice or bartlett pears, quartered, cored and sliced
2 tbsp. light brown sugar
2 tbsp. brandy or cider
1 tsp. ground ginger
¼ tsp. ground allspice freshly grated nutmeg coarse salt and freshly ground white pepper
3 large eggs, separated
½ tsp. ground cinnamon
3 dashes hot sauce

Heat oven to 350. Generously butter an 8-inch square baking dish or a round 3-quart casserole and sprinkle a heaping ¼ cup of the almonds over the bottom and sides.

Peel the sweet potatoes and pass them through a food mill into a big mixing bowl.

Heat the butter in a large skillet over medium-high heat. When the butter stops foaming, add the pear slices and cook, stirring once or twice, until they are evenly coated with butter. Sprinkle on 1 tbsp. of the brown sugar and cook until the pears are starting to fall apart and the juices are beginning to caramelize, about 5 minutes. Transfer the sautéed pears to the food mill and puree them into the bowl with the potatoes.

Return the pan to the heat and pour in the brandy. Bring to a quick boil, scraping with a wooden spoon to dissolve the caramelized bits, and then stir the liquid into the mashed sweet potatoes. Season with the ginger, allspice, a few gratings of nutmeg and salt and white pepper.

Whisk the egg yolks until they are light and frothy. Stir the yolks into the sweet potatoes and scrape the lot into the baking dish. Bake until heated through and beginning to bubble around the edges, 40 to 45 minutes.

During the last few minutes of baking, whisk the egg whites with the remaining 1 tbsp. brown sugar, the cinnamon, and a pinch of salt to soft peaks. Fold the hot sauce and 2 tbsp. of the almonds into the meringue.

Remove the casserole from the oven and spread the meringue evenly over the sweet potatoes. Sprinkle the remaining 2 tbsp. almonds on top of the meringue and return the dish to the oven. Bake until the meringue is golden brown, another 10 to 12 minutes, and serve. Serves 6 to 8.

Note: Be careful when you toast the almonds. If you brown them too much, they'll burn when you bake the casserole, so aim for beige.

Passover Food Ideas

Horseradish gives a good kick

BY RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Pesach and horseradish go together. It's on the seder plate and tops the gefilte fish. Many people over 50 or so have fond memories of a parent or grandparent patiently grating horseradish for the Passover seders by hand. What would Pesach be without chrein?

Funny name, isn't it? Horseradish, however, has nothing to do with horses and it is not a radish (it's a member of the mustard family). The name may have come from an English adaptation of its German name. In earlier times, the plant grew wild in European coastal areas; the Germans called it Meerretich, or "sea radish." The German word Meer sounds like "mare" in English. Perhaps "mare-radish" eventually became "horseradish." The word "horseradish" first appeared in print in 1597 in John Gerarde's English herbal on medicinal plants.

Horseradish root

It's a pity to save horseradish for Passover use only. It's a low-calorie, natural condiment that adds a distinctive, pungent flavour to foods. It is commonly used as a relish with meat and fish or as a tangy seasoning in sauces served with these foods. It can also add zest to appetizers, relishes, dips, spreads, salads, salad dressings, sauces and gravies. Some cooks use it generously to give a "hot" taste to food; others find that a small amount of horseradish is sufficient to impart a subtle, delightful flavour that turns an ordinary dish into an extra special one.

Did you know? Chances are that the horseradish you use was grown in the U.S. midwest. More than two-thirds of North American horseradish comes from Madison and St. Clair counties in southwestern Illinois. Most of it is grown near Collinsville in what is called the American Bottoms, the most concentrated area of horseradish production in the world. The superior quality of Illinois horseradish is due to fertile soils, a suitable climate, and producers skilled in special cultural methods.

The sharp and piquant flavour and the penetrating smell of horseradish become apparent when the root is grated or ground. This is because the root contains highly volatile oils that are released by enzyme activity when the root cells are crushed.

Why not make your own horseradish sauce this year? Your cost will be a fraction of that of purchased horseradish and it's fun, too. Buy good-quality roots: clean, firm and free from cuts and deep blemishes. The freshly peeled or sliced root and the prepared product are creamy white. Generally, the whiter the root, the fresher it is.

You will need a Pesachdik food processor, a well-ventilated kitchen (open windows and doors, fan an asset), a large bowl (at least 12-in. diameter), lots of empty jars or plastic containers and an hour and half. Everything within a radius of 3 feet may turn red. Wear gloves, or else your hands will take on that hard-earned, brown-in-the-cracks look. When the fumes get to be too much and the tears start coming, that's OK; think of all the troubles of the Jewish people past and present! Don't wear your best clothes.

Fresh horseradish varies greatly in strength and that is why the measurements below are not exact. If you like it "weaker," add more beets.

HOMEMADE HORSERADISH SAUCE

8-10 lb. fresh beets
1/2-1 cup water from cooked beets
1 fresh horseradish root (about 1 lb.)
1/2-1 cup vinegar or lemon juice (or a combination)
2-3 tbsp. sugar
salt and pepper to taste

Scrub beets and cut off stems. Cut in halves. Cook covered in a large quantity of rapidly boiling water for 40-50 minutes or until tender (a fork penetrates easily). Save about two cups of the cooking liquid. Cool beets under running water. When cool enough to handle, peel; the peel will slip off easily. Cut each piece in half. Insert steel blade into food processor and chop beets finely, in batches. Place in a large mixing bowl.

Scrape or peel horseradish root. Cut into 1-in. slices. Chop in the food processor in batches until very fine. Try not to breathe! Add horseradish to beets.

Thoroughly combine beets and horseradish. Add beet-cooking liquid, vinegar and/or lemon juice, sugar, salt and pepper to taste. Mix well and taste. Correct seasonings. Store in tightly closed containers in refrigerator. Will keep a long time, but gradually loses strength. Yield: enough chrein for at least a few months!

Gefilte fish with horseradish sauce

POTATO SALAD WITH HORSERADISH

2/3-1 cup mayonnaise
1/4 cup horseradish sauce, drained
2 eggs, hard-boiled, chopped
1 cup celery, chopped
1/4 cup onion, chopped
4 cups new warm potatoes, cubed
sugar, salt and pepper to taste

Mix all ingredients in a bowl and pour over warm potatoes. Adjust seasoning. Serve immediately or chill in a tightly covered container.

Anton Kuerti concert to be taped for CBC special

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Internationally renowned pianist Anton Kuerti joins his wife, acclaimed cellist Kristine Bogyo, in an upcoming concert to be taped for a CBC documentary.

"I very rarely play with my wife," Kuerti says. "There have been a lot of discussion and opinions flying back and forth. We don't always agree on everything, as is the case with most married couples. We looked over a lot of pieces together."

The concert will be held March 17 at 3 p.m. at Walter Hall, 80 Queen's Park Cres. It is to be filmed for a doacumentary about the couple called A Marriage in Music, produced by Zephyr Films for CBC-TV's performing arts series Opening Night.

One of the pieces they will perform is Magog, which was composed by Kuerti for Bogyo when they first met at a music centre near Magog, Que.

They will also play César Franck's Cello Sonata, which Kuerti says is the same as the composer's Violin Sonata, but appropriate to play on either instrument.

Kuerti will also play two solos, Beethoven's Piano Sonata No. 24 in F Sharp Major, Op. 78 and Mendelssohn's Fantaisie in F Sharp Minor, Op. 28.

The Austrian-born, American-raised pianist has lived in Canada for 30 years. At the age of 11, he performed a Grieg concerto with Arthur Fiedler. He has studied with a who's who of musical greats – Arthur Loesser, Mieczyslaw Horsozowski and Rudolf Serkin – and has performed in 38 countries and with most major U.S. orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic.

Kuerti has recorded approximately 50 CDs, has been honoured with a number of awards, prizes, and honorary doctorates, and an officer of the Order of Canada.

"I am blessed because I spend most of the time doing what I love doing most and getting paid for it as well," Kuerti says.

Theatre school grad gets his debut in The Edible Woman

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A 23-year-old graduate of the National Theatre School is making his professional acting debut with one of Canada's most prestigious theatre companies.

Michael Rubenfeld plays Trevor in CanStage's production of The Edible Woman. The play written by Dave Carley based on the Margaret Atwood's first novel is running till March 16 at the Bluma Appel Theatre at the St. Lawrence Centre of the Arts, 27 Front St. E. in Toronto.

The Edible Woman traces the journey of a young woman named Marian, who has a good job and a handsome fiancé, but slowly her world becomes unfocused.

"The play is about a woman's struggle to find what she wants and needs, she finds herself through exploration," the Winnipeg-born Toronto resident says.

"In the play, Marian played by actress Jillian Fargey, has an affair with my character's roommate Duncan, played by Darren Keay. My part is not very large, but I'm talked about throughout the entire play because my roommate and I are co-dependant. I'm his paternal roommate and he is sort of the child who needs me to take care of him and I need him," says Rubenfeld.

Rubenfeld went to a general audition that was hastily called when a female cast member who was to play three roles including the male role of Trevor quit at the last minute. The production team decided to divide the roles among two actors and for the first time that The Edible Women has been produced on stage, actually picked a male actor to play Trevor. Rubenfeld had only four days for rehearsal to prepare for his first foray into the Toronto theatre scene.

"I have a nice little part, I come out on stage and say really funny stuff. I feel very fortunate and honoured to be working at CanStage; they've been very supportive of my work. My profession makes me feel that I live in a bit of a pipe dream. For me, this is the most fun I could possibly imagine having in my life and realising that I could possibly make a living from it," says Rubenfeld.

Rubenfeld isn't the first artistic one in his family, although he claims it skipped a generation. His grandfather sang in a trio with his two sisters in their native France, prior to World War 11.

The actor has completed a short film called Room Tones and a feature film called Summer to be released in June. He prefers the theatre to film.

"I love the theatre, I'm writing for the theatre too. I write about Jews, believe it or not. I'm on my third draft of a play. It is about the father in a Conservative Jewish family who has an affair with a non-Jewish woman and how it affects the rest of the family," he says.

For tickets to The Edible Woman call CanStage at 416-368-3110 or TicketMaster at 416-872-1111.

THE TRAVELLERS MARK GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY WITH HOOTENANNY

The Travellers, the acclaimed Canadian folk group that sang folk, labour and protest songs throughout the 1950s, are scheduled to hold a hootenanny this spring in what has become perhaps Toronto's hottest folk club.

According to group leader Jerry Gray, the evening marks the beginning of The Travellers' 50th consecutive year of performance. Gray is the only original member of the band, which he reconstituted after it broke up in the '60s.

Its top hit, which brought the foursome instant fame, was a Canadianized version of the Woodie Guthrie song, This Land Is My Land.

In the good old days of folk music and social activism, a hootenanny "was supposed to be like a community singsong," Gray explains. "We'd all sit around and swap songs. That was the idea. The songs had a social purpose."

The Travellers' hootenanny takes place at Hugh'sroom, 2261 Dundas St. W. at Bloor. May 1, 8:30 p.m. Reservations, 416-531-6604. Details at Web site www.hughsroom.com.

Incidentally, Gray reports that the NFB documentary on The Travellers that premiered last year at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival generated good reviews after a recent screening at the New York Jewish Film Festival.

Mel Brooks Live: Celebrated Jewish comic Mel Brooks breezed into town recently to plug the upcoming Toronto production of his huge Broadway hit musical, The Producers. Brooks was the surprise guest at a Mirvish Productions news conference at which Ed and David Mirvish unveiled the hit show as the lead production in their new subscription season.

Based on the film of the same name, The Producers tells the story of a down-on-his-luck theatrical producer Max Bialystock and his timid accountant Leo Bloom, who hatch a scam to raise money for a Broadway show that they expect will be a fiasco. It's reportedly next to impossible to get tickets to the musical in New York. For ticket information here, phone 416-593-4225 or visit the Web site www.mirvish.com.

Tragic Love at Glendon: The Swiss play Aimee and Jaguar, a "riveting two-woman show," comes to York University's Glendon Theatre this week.

The play is based on the true story of the tragic love between Elisabeth Wust, a Nazi officer's wife in 1940s Berlin, and Felice Schragenheim, a Jewish lesbian who died at Bergen-Belsen. The story was the basis of a bestselling book by Erica Fischer.

Aimee and Jaguar stars Graziella Rossi and Pia Waibel. It is being performed March 11 in English and March 12 in German, 8 p.m. Glendon Theatre, Glendon College, 2275 Bayview Ave. (south of Lawrence). $5 at the door.

The Glendon Gallery opens its doors prior to the performances for a special viewing of Still Life, an exhibition by Thelma Rosner that pays tribute to two women who independently wrote cookbooks in Nazi concentration camps.

Make the most of your stopover in Britain

By KATHRYN KATES
and RANDY ROWETT
Special to The CJN

LONDON — Many Canadian travellers destined for exotic places such as Malta, Cyprus and South Africa need to make flight connections through London, England.

No matter; if you have a long day's wait before boarding your final flight or you choose to take advantage of your stopover by staying in England for a longer period of time, there is plenty to do in and around the British capital.

While in London, you should invest in The London Pass. For £4.99 GBP (approximately $12 Cdn) a three-day pass gives you free entry to over 60 attractions and public transportation on all city trains, tubes and buses. Places of interest include the Tower of London, Buckingham Palace, the British Museum, Kensington Palace, the Royal Air Force Museum and the Tate Britain, where admission is free, but your pass will get you a complimentary Acoustiguide.

Also included in London's north end are the Jewish Museum in Finchley, dedicated to the lively social history of London's Jewish immigration and settlement and the Jewish Museum in Camden which received a "highly commended" from Visitor Attraction: London Tourism Awards 2000. The Camden museum explores the Jewish community in Britain and beyond.

If your stopover is just too short to contemplate visiting all the attractions, then consider a quick overview with one of the tours offered on The London Pass such as the London Pride Sightseeing Tours aboard an open-topped double decker bus or Catamaran Cruisers' boat tour along the Thames River. The more energetic will enjoy a guided tour of London by bike from the London Bicycle Tour Company, just remember to cycle on the left-hand side.

If you plan to shop in London – a very tempting thing to do, some interesting places to drop your pounds are Covent Gardens with its quirky boutiques, Carnaby Street for retro chic, Notting Hill for hip fashion, Kings Road for high fashion and Portobello Road for second hand fashion.

Of course, a London shopping spree should include at least a peek at Harrods, the glamorous seven-storey department store in Knightsbridge.

A must-do during your London stopover is to attend a matinee or evening performance at one of London's historical West End theatres or the nearby London Palladium in Oxford Circus.

The London Palladium has presented many wonderful theatricals and great variety acts over the years, as immortalised by BBC television and seen in Canada, a few decades ago.

Public transport into London from all three airports is easy. The underground at Heathrow will take you directly to Paddington Station. Gatwick to the south and Stansted to the north are connected to the city's underground system by train. In fact, purchased prior to leaving Canada, the BritRail Classic or Flexi Pass offers affordable transportation, not only from the airports to London, but throughout Great Britain with 18,000 daily departures from England, Wales and Scotland.

A number of travellers are making their way to England by charter to Gatwick Airport before catching a flight to another country, boarding a train or cruise liner, renting a car to tour England or crossing through the Chunnel to France. If you prefer a stopover that takes you to the English countryside surrounding Gatwick instead of heading to the streets of London, there are a number of small charming towns to hang your bowler hat.

The South Lodge Hotel in Lower Beeding, North Horsham in West Sussex is only 15 minutes from Gatwick, if you don't get lost on the roads' roundabouts. This breathtaking Victorian country house built in 1883, lies on a 90-acre garden overlooking the rolling South Downs. Private coach tours are offered to Brighton's Royal Pavilion and nearby attractions including Petworth House and Leonardslee Gardens.

Dover the "Gateway to Great Britain" since Roman times, is the place many tourists find themselves when their stopover brings them to England with continued travel by train across the English Channel to Calais, France or to board a cruise ship from the city's famed naval port.

Sights to see in Dover include the Battle of Britain Museum, Roman Painted House, Dover Transport Museum, the Women's Land Army Museum and Dover Castle with its Secret Wartime Tunnels. Wallett's Court Country House Hotel and Spa is a charming property that sits on the White Cliffs of Dover.

Reviewer delves into books and films

By SHEILA DROPKIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — To Heather Kassel, a film is more than just a movie and a novel is more than just a story.

One of several professional leaders of literary discussion groups in Toronto, Kassel's course at Beth Tikvah Synagogue covers five books and five films each year, with no classes given in July and August.

After watching each film and reading each book a minimum of three times, Kassel does far more than critique what's on the screen or the page. She delves into the backgrounds of the authors, screenwriters and directors, unearthing their family histories and the reasons why they got involved in their projects.

"By the time I've read a book for the third time, all the characters are family to me," she says. "I study the books and films intently, trying to get as much out of them as possible. My ultimate goal is to help people see film differently and to read books differently, to see what's behind the obvious."

Relying largely on the public library and Internet for her research, Kassel has also been known to phone authors with questions. For her film reviews, she also studies camera angles, and the use of colour and music.

Kassel's most recent review subject, Nurse Betty, starring Renee Zellweger and Morgan Freeman, is a case in point.

The film, she said, is much more than a frothy trifle or a dark comedy. She described it as a psychological study and a parallel to The Wizard of Oz. Both tales depict a witness to a horrendous event (a very bloody murder-by-scalping in Betty's case and a devastating storm for the Wizard's Dorothy) who find refuge in a dissociative fugue state or amnesia caused by fright and an identity transformation.

A former high school English and math teacher, Kassel considers herself "always a teacher; that's what excites me." While she started out reviewing only books, she added movies to her repertoire when videocassettes became popular, and she studied film at York University to learn more about the medium.

"With film, I am reaching a larger audience," she says. "It's more expedient for many people who don't have the time to read books. Film is a legitimate artform now."

The reviewed items, she says, must be award-winners or short-listed for major prizes and provide a cross-section of points of view and themes. The books are all in paperback and Canadian content is included whenever possible.

Kassel, who was born in Hamilton, has influenced her family with her views. Her husband, a physician, once thought "films are only for entertainment but is now keen to go" to more serious fare, she says. Her children – two sons and a daughter – are all interested in film. Kassel jokes that her daughter, who is also a voracious reader, once turned down a prospective suitor because he didn't like foreign films.

Pianist's concert to be taped for CBC

Kuerti's repertoire features 50 concertos, including his own. He is known for his commentaries on music, including a weekly CBC radio series. The pianist takes pride in exposing his audiences to lesser-known works.

"Sometimes musicians are astonished when they find something of really high quality, yet by a little known composer," he says. "For example, I'm directing a big festival in June in Edmonton of the music of Carl Czerny, a student of Beethoven, sponsored by the Canadian Centre of Austrian and Central European Studies located at the University of Alberta."

Kuerti has two sons; the eldest is a budding conductor and the youngest, plays the cello like his mother. When not performing, he enjoys skiing and white-water rafting.

He is also involved in politics. In 1988, he ran as a federal candidate for the NDP. He believes that for a parliament to properly represent a population it should have people in it from all backgrounds and not be composed almost entirely of businessmen and lawyers.

Now a member of the Green party, Kuerti would consider running again given the opportunity.

Business Profile

Sangoma – an Internet company with real products

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There was a time not that long ago when a company with a .com at the end of its name had to beat off potential investors with a stick, if not a bundle of fibre optic cable.

Fearing they would be left behind, people threw money by the bushel at companies making an Internet play, even if their business plans proudly forecast no profits today or for the foreseeable future.

Those were heady days for fly-by-nighters and legitimate enterprises alike, but those days are gone.

Today, a .com at the end of a corporate name is poison, a curse, a not-so-subtle signal to badly burned investors to stay away. Hence, one Toronto area company with real, concrete products you can touch has dumped the .com from its name and re-assumed its old, reliable moniker.

In existence since 1984 (a fact it proudly displays on its media handouts), Sangoma Technologies is a specialty shop. It has been quietly and diligently plugging away, creating a comfortable niche for itself in the Internet market in which it developed equipment that simplified a complex routing procedure.

Wanpipe is a piece of equipment that resembles an internal modem or video card; it replaces external routers and other equipment that link office PCs to the Internet or to a company's internal network at remote locations. Unlike the bulky boxes widely in use that take up valuable desk space, use lots of power and are difficult to fix, the Wanpipe is installed directly in servers, saving space and money, and making it far easier for techies to diagnose system problems.

'Not just smoke and mirrors.'

Where other Internet companies promised the moon, Sangoma relied on word of mouth to expand its modest customer base, centred mostly in the United States, Germany, Poland and Israel.

For David Mandelstam and Gideon Hack, that was just the way they liked it. The principals behind Sangoma for many years, they were happy running a specialty shop that provided a steady if unspectacular revenue stream in which everyone at the shop made a comfortable living.

A couple of years ago, however, they were convinced to take the company public and they were faced with an offer they couldn't refuse. Sangoma was listed on the Canadian Venture Exchange in March 2001. Mandelstam and Hack went from majority partners to minority shareholders, while Mandelstam took on the added responsibilities of president and CEO and Hack, vice-president and chief technology officer.

"It's a different business," Mandelstam conceded. "It's interesting. It's been a real growth experience.

"Before, we spent time thinking about technical things. Now... there's a pressure to perform. People have to be informed."

In their new roles, sharehholders have to be coddled and the company's products have to be publicized. Getting the company's name "out there" comes close to being job one.

"Before, we had very simple jobs," Mandelstam said. "We had to sell cards. Now we have to sell ourselves."

Mandelstam and Hack admit they're still getting used to that part of the business.

Still, they're grateful being where they are. Many companies servicing the Internet did not survive the shakeout that struck when the Internet stock bubble burst.

For Hack, the reason for Sangoma's success was simple. The company never overextended itself. "We had real products, not just smoke and mirrors," he said.

"We had a viable business. We had customers. We had revenue," added Mandelstam.

Back in the mid-'80s, Mandelstam, 55, started Sangoma in partnership with a neighbour. Even then, the product was an early equivalent to today's routing equipment, though at very low line speeds, said Mandelstam, a mechanical engineer by training.

Hack, who grew up in Pretoria, South Africa, emigrated to Canada in 1987 and joined his uncle, Mandelstam, as a software engineer. Hack, 40, wrote much of the programming that allowed the company's hardware devices to function.

In 1989, he bought out the other partner and the company settled into its pattern of holding on to its market while constantly upgrading its product line.

Another of its inventory items is a board that facilitates in-store point-of-sale connections to outside computers. It too is part of the WAN (wide area network) communications hardware and software products that Sangoma specializes in.

David Mandelstam (left) and Gideon Hack with their Wanpipe.

While the Wanpipe has proved popular among its already loyal roster of customers – at $849 (US) it replaces external equipment that could cost around $3,000 (US) – the company continues its research and development to find new WAN cards for different services in the business world.

Eventually, Hack said, the company will develop products for the home retail market as well.

There's a $2.1-billion U.S. market in router equipment for small business out there, Mandelstam said. "If we grew 10,000 per cent, we'd capture one per cent of it."

In the long term, he predicts, "We will do orders of magnitude better than we are now."

So far, the company's numbers are quite modest.

For the first quarter of the 2001-02 fiscal year, Sangoma reported net income of $187,649 (Cdn) on sales of $708,179 (unaudited), or $.007 per share.

In the fiscal year ended June 30, 2001, the company's total loss, taking into account goodwill amortization and income taxes, was $1.1 million ($.039 a share), compared to a gain of $.1 million the year before.

"It's been a more difficult year than we'd have liked to experience," Mandelstam acknowledged. "Things appear to be turning around.

"We're the best kept secret in Canada," he added.

President

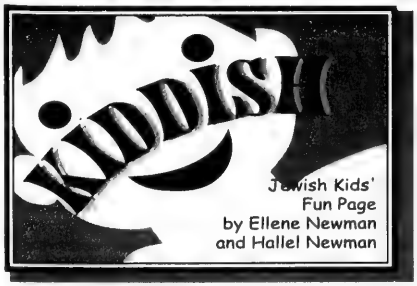
Michelle Goldstein



3,800 years ago, all the world's people worshipped idols. But one little boy had doubts. This story has been adapted from the midrash.

Avram and the Idols

Avram sat on the floor of his father's idol shop, gazing at the nearly empty shelves.

"Avram," called his father Terach from the next room. "I have a new batch. Set 'em up, and if anybody comes in, tell them about today's two-for-one deal. I have an appointment with King Nimrod, and I won't be back until tonight. See you later."

Avram went into the adjoining room, where the newest batch of idols lay gleaming in the light. Avram looked at them and thought to himself for the umpteenth time, "They're just statues... how could anybody worship stones and wood, gold and silver?"

While he was putting the new idols on the shelves, an elderly man walked in.

"Good morning," he smiled. "I need to buy a new house protection god." He added in an embarrassed whisper, "Someone stole my old one last night. Say, that one looks nice! How much is it?"

"The 'Protection Baal'? That's on sale for $249.99. But could I ask you a question? How old are you?"

"I'll be 79 in a month."

"This statue was made last week, and you, a 78 year old man, want to pray to it?"

"You know, young man, you have a point there. I... well... maybe I don't want to buy it. I'll have to think about it."

The man left, shaking his head and thinking.

A young woman entered. "Oh hello, Avram. Are you behaving yourself? I've brought an offering for Zorroz."

She put a small dish of food in front of the largest idol in the shop. Zorroz was seven feet tall, had a huge ruby set into his forehead, and was coated with a thick layer of solid gold. She bowed before the statue and left.

Avram sat alone in the shop again, looking at the shelves stacked with statues. How could anybody be stupid enough to think these have any power? He grabbed his father's axe and chopped the idols, one by one, into tiny pieces. Fragments of earthenware and gold, silver and wood, littered the floor.

Just then Avram heard his father's distinctive footsteps outside. There was only one idol still standing, the imposing Zorroz.

Avram shoved the axe into Zorroz's outstretched hands just as Terach opened the door.

"Avram, did you sell any... What in the world happened here?"

"Nothing much, Dad. Zorroz wanted that dish of food there, but the other ones wanted it too, so he chopped 'em up."

"Don't lie to me, Avram," raged Terach. "Zorroz can't move! He can't pick up an axe any more than he can talk or breathe!"

"Exactly," agreed Avram. "So why do you worship him?"

Friedlichs celebrate 75 years of marriage

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Is there a secret to being happily married for 75 years?

"You have to be considerate, you have to compromise, and you have to say yes when you want to say no," said Lewis Friedlich, 101. He and his wife Aurelia, 94, recently celebrated their 75th wedding anniversary.

Lewis and Aurelia Friedlich

"There are times when you have to give in, and you must not hesitate to do so. You should not do anything in excess, and last, but most important, listen to your doctor and keep on good terms with the guy upstairs," he said.

The Friedlichs, who live on their own in a spacious, midtown apartment, married in Budapest, Hungary, on Feb. 6, 1927, six months after they met on a boat en route from Vienna to Budapest.

"She was so beautiful; I loved her at once," Lewis said.

"I also noticed him," Aurelia added.

The couple, who spoke to The CJN at their home, raised two sons and now have five grandchildren and 10 great-grandchildren. "Our family is close; they come to visit whenever they can, and they often take us out for a meal.

"Our great-grandchildren feel at home at our house. Aurelia sits on the floor and plays with them; she could be a recycled teenager."

The couple immigrated to Canada 52 years ago to escape the Communist regime in Hungary. "It was very difficult at first," Lewis said. "I was unemployed for several months until I found a job packing groceries at Loblaws."

Eventually, Lewis, who was an executive in a lumber conglomerate in Budapest, took over a lumber company here, and ran it until he retired in 1978.

Until only a few years ago he helped his son Steve run his engineering consulting firm, taking care of bookkeeping and the payroll.

"I had to stop though when my eyes and legs became bad. Our bodies are made out of bones, not steel. They get weaker," Lewis said.

"We have to express our thanks to Canada, our adopted country. Although we experienced some difficulties when we arrived, we became accepted members of the community and have been very happy here."

With pride, he displays their anniversary greeting from Queen Elizabeth. "It came in the mail, just like all our other cards," he said.

Seniors prepare for their bat mitzvahs

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — One doesn't usually use "bat mitzvah" and "home for the elderly" in the same sentence, but Cantor Daniel Benlolo is out to prove that the two are a perfect fit.

A popular local bar and bat mitzvah teacher, Benlolo has been teaching weekly bat mitzvah classes for the last four months to a group of women who never dreamed they would be doing such a thing in their golden years.

Seven women at the Bess and Moe Greenberg Family Hillel Lodge are committed to completing the course and celebrating their bat mitzvahs together on Mother's Day (May 12). A "quartet of Bettys" – Rosenberg, Liebhoff, Ballon and Wax – as well as Pearl Muroff, Miriam Gordon and Mavis Dover are eager to show their families and friends what they have accomplished.

The women, most of whom do not read Hebrew, are learning to read the Ten Commandments phonetically, in large print. Each one has been given a personalized folder with her part highlighted.

"This has changed my whole view on Judaism in that I suddenly realized that I have other obligations to myself and my family," Gordon said. "My sons and their families are very observant and now I, too, read more and study more."

Rosenberg said she "was the first one to [volunteer], because this is something that was not part of our family life when I was growing up and I wanted to do it."

The classes are held in the lodge's chapel, where Benlolo also performs weekly for the residents.

"I wanted to do something to give back to the lodge. I thought a nice way would be to have a bar/bat mitzvah program for the elderly, and Stephen Schneiderman, the executive director, was enthusiastic about my suggestion," Benlolo said.

"The women come from all different streams of Judaism, but it seems to me that each of them has a very traditional family background," he said. "They reminisce about when they were children and never thought they would have an opportunity to have a bat mitzvah."

Students from Yitzhak Rabin High School have been volunteering to help the bat mitzvah students and will be present on the big day to help with hair and makeup.

"The day will be very special, with the ceremony followed by music and a big party," Benlolo said.

Meanwhile, across the street at the Tamir Residence for developmentally challenged adults, Benlolo has also been tutoring three women and hopes they too will be able to have a bat mitzvah.

Israel & the Jewish World

Saudis won't table peace plan unless Arafat at summit, PA minister says

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Saudi Arabian Crown Prince Abdullah will not present a new Middle East peace proposal at an upcoming Arab summit if Israel does not lift travel restrictions on Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and allow him to attend, a senior Palestinian official said Monday.

"Prince Abdullah informed me that he would not present his ideas to the Arab summit if President Arafat didn't participate in it," Palestinian Planning Minister Nabil Sha'ath said by phone from Jeddah, a day after meeting the crown prince.

Sha'ath said Abdullah also raised Israel's travel ban on Arafat with senior U.S. officials and was optimistic he would win Washington's support for ending Arafat's confinement. Sha'ath added the prince also pledged $50 million to help the Palestinian Authority out of its current financial crisis.

Abdullah had been expected to present his peace plan in detail to a March 27-28 Arab League summit in Beirut.

He has floated the idea of a full Israeli withdrawal from the territories captured in the 1967 Six-Day War in exchange for Arab recognition of Israel and the full normalization of relations.

European Union officials Monday urged the United States and Arab nations to rally behind the initiative. "We need to do all to ensure that the Saudi initiative succeeds," EU Commission external relations spokesperson Gunnar Wiegand told reporters.

EU security chief Javier Solana is discussing details of the Saudi plan in Washington this week, following talks with Prince Abdullah in Jeddah. But EU officials are adamant that Arab countries must also back the initiative.

"We hope the plan can muster the support of all Arab League members," Wiegand said. "We have to break the current impasse," Wiegand went on to say, insisting that the recent "dramatic escalation of violence" in the region required quick action. "We cannot continue like this," Wiegand added.

Israel has not made a formal response to Abdullah's plan, but Cabinet Secretary Gideon Saar said Sunday the proposal that Israel withdraw to its pre-1967 war borders was an unacceptable precondition and that permanent frontiers could only be determined by negotiation.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has pledged not to return to the pre-1967 borders, but he has not rejected the Saudi proposal out of hand.

Israeli rink rats make pilgrimage to hockey's holy land

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Teenage hockey players are pretty much the same the world over. They love the sound of sharp skates digging into fast ice, the snap you hear when a puck is passed crisply tape to tape, the cool of the rink air, the elation of scoring that all-important go-ahead goal.

In Israel, the opportunity for young guys to thoroughly immerse themselves in a hockey milieu is difficult, to say the least. Sure, Israel has an embryonic hockey culture – of a sort – if you're lucky enough to live somewhere around the country's two rinks in Metulla and Ma'alot, in Israel's far north.

Kids in that neck of the woods are able to get on the ice a few times a week, but games that mean anything are few and far between.

So, for the Israeli national junior team, a trip to Canada is like a visit to hockey heaven. There are rinks everywhere, hockey on TV, lots of teams to play, a Hall of Fame to visit, and, can you believe it, a backyard rink where you can play in the open air.

Soon after arriving for their week-long visit to the icy north, the junior puck handlers laced up their Tacks and enjoyed a couple of hours of shinny on the backyard rink at the home of Michael Budman, one of the principals behind Roots and a supporter of the Israeli hockey program.

The boys were smiling ear to ear when they came off the ice, clearly reveling in their hockey road trip experience. There to greet them was Ottawa Senators assistant coach Roger Neilson, who has operated his hockey school in the Canada Centre rink in Metulla for several years, developing personal relationships with many of the sabra skaters along the way.

Neilson, who has visited Israel on several occasions and who ends his night at the office with a check of the latest Internet news stories from the Holy Land, drove down from Ottawa during the Olympic break to visit with the Israeli youngsters.

"It's great for the kids, to see all those Canadian hockey things," said Neilson.

"The kids in Israel were surprisingly competitive. In the games, they really go at it. Obviously they don't have the skill of the Canadian kids, but they have more than you'd expect."

In past years, several of the better Israelis skaters have made the trek to Lindsay, Ont., to take part in Neilson's summer hockey school. One of them was Matan Nemenov, a hockey enthusiast if ever there was one. His brother, Shalev, is a member of the junior team. Matan loves the game, but where a Canadian teen of his ability would continue in junior hockey, Matan's life took a different turn.

Neilson shakes his head as Shalev explains that his brother is now a Cobra helicopter pilot in the Israeli Defence Force. There's not much time in his schedule for hockey right now.

But for Shalev, 17, and Matan before him, hockey is the greatest game. "It's fast, it's physical, it's smart," he said. What's more, "I love these guys," pointing to his teammates around him who are busy chowing down on pizza and watching Olympic highlights on TV.

Hof Eden, also 17, hails from kibbutz Snir, near Mount Hermon. He's been skating for 10 years at the rink in Metulla and playing hockey for seven years.

As for Shalev, hockey for him "is a big part of my life." A Pittsburgh Penguins fan who idolizes Jaromir Jagr (now with Washington) and Mario Lemieux, Eden enjoys "the adrenaline and the fun. I love it and I'm good [at] it."

There are certainly plenty of good senior hockey players in Israel, many of them transplanted Russians. One of them is Eddie Revniaga, 29, a member of the country's national team. Revniaga, who helped coach the juniors in Canada, hails from Riga, Latvia. Prior to emigrating to Israel six years ago, he played for Riga Dynamo, the city's top team, on the same squad as current NHLers Sandis Ozolinish (Carolina Hurricanes) and Sergei Zholtok (Minnesota Wild). When Revniaga, a right winger, was on the team, Dynamo finished second in the national under-18 tournament, losing to Traktor Chelyabinsk.

When Revniaga moved to Israel, he thought he'd have to give up hockey for good. But when he heard of the rink in Metulla, he moved north to nearby Ma'alot. In 1997, he suited up for the first time for Israel's senior team and helped them in later years to International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) Pool D gold and silver medals.

Still, in Israel the regular season lasts only 16 games and he would love to play much more.

Tournaments are what makes the season worthwhile and the trip to Canada was "very exciting. I can tell you we made many preparations to come and play good," he said.

Sergei Matin is a Russian oleh who has moved from playing on Israel's senior national team to coaching the team and running the country's hockey federation – small as it is.

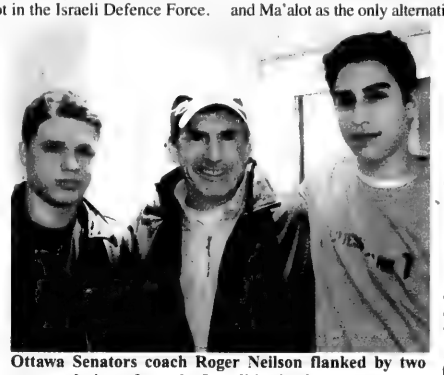
As president of the Israel Ice Hockey Federation, he is in charge of organizing the national program and trying to find the cash to make it run.

Recent years have been lean, with the program's budget slashed from $120,000 (US) five years ago to about $25,000 (US) this year. The federation gets a small amount from the country's sports lottery and an even smaller sum from the Ministry of Education.

A $25,000 grant from the Edward Bronfman family foundation will make a huge difference to the program, he said.

But even with it, Israeli hockey faces serious problems, number 1 among them being the shortage of rinks.

In the early 1990s, skaters could play in four or five rinks in the Tel Aviv/Jerusalem/Haifa triangle. Although they were tiny and had "boards" made of cinder blocks, they were convenient and offered what would turn out to be plenty of ice time. Things took a turn for the worse in the last few years when the rinks in central Israel were closed, leaving the ones in distant Metulla and Ma'alot as the only alternatives.



Ottawa Senators coach Roger Neilson flanked by two young admirers from the Israeli junior hockey team.

"It's a very difficult situation for us at the moment," he said.

The hockey federation is working to correct the problem, and Matin is hopeful an Olympic rink will be constructed in central Israel within two years. (Similar hopes were expressed by hockey spokespeople several years ago, with no result.)

Meanwhile, the national senior team is gearing up for an International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) Division II, Group A tournament in Cape Town, South Africa, from March 29 to April 7. Israel will face off against teams from Turkey, Australia, Belgium, Estonia and South Africa.

Two years ago, Israel won a gold medal in D Division play but instead of advancing to the C Division, it remained in the newly-created Division II after the IIHF reorganized. Last year, Israel won a silver medal, losing to Romania, which advanced to Division 1.

Prior to this year's IIHF tournament, the senior team expects to bolster its lineup with North American "ringers," adding as many as nine or 10 players. Matin expects Israel to compete for the gold medal, though it will be very difficult to beat Estonia. "But we'll try to beat them."

The juniors, meanwhile, will re-enter international tournament competition next season.

Hapoel stun Parma in UEFA Cup clash

By ELI SHVIDLER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARMA, Italy — Hapoel Tel Aviv again made history on Feb. 28 when it stunned Italian Serie A side Parma AC 2-1 in the away leg of their fourth round UEFA Cup clash. The team now advances to the final eight of the prestigious annual tournament.

Hapoel, which has already progressed further than any other Israeli team in a European club competition, went ahead 1-0 in the 33rd minute when striker Milan Osterc exploited a lapse in the Parma defence and slid the ball into the back of the net from 12 metres out.

Hapoel midfielder Istvan Pischont put the game almost out of reach when he scored in the 55th minute to put the Israelis up 2-0. In the closing stages of the game, Parma pulled to within one goal.

With both sides failing to score in the first leg at Bloomfield in Tel Aviv a week before, Hapoel needed either a win or a scoring draw to progress to the last eight. Parma had to win outright, or in a penalty shoot-out, to get through to the next round.

Some political odours

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

It's little wonder we're cynical about politics. Well, some of us are.

Example: Herb Gray, the Jewish former deputy prime minister, served as a loyal Liberal MP and in several unglamorous cabinet posts for nearly 40 years. He was stolid but reliable, a team player, durable, faithful to a fault, the ultimate Grit good soldier. He was once termed the Quiet Consigliere.

For his troubles, Gray was sacked from government with all the ceremony of a boil lancing. While Preston Manning was feted and lauded in the House of Commons for his nine years in Parliament, Gray was forced to resign his seat by the time the House reconvened from its Christmas break, precluding a proper send-off. One day, he was the number two man in government – the highest position ever attained by a Jewish politician in this country, the winner of 13 straight elections – and the next, he was shipped off to a backwater called the International Joint Commission, which monitors U.S.-Canada cross-border environmental issues.

Gray's treatment was disgraceful, and I imagine most MPs know it. The deputy PM had just returned from Israel, where he was busy defending this country's sometimes shaky relations with the Jewish state, when he was summoned that same night to 24 Sussex Drive to be told that John Manley would be getting his job. Sorry old boy, but that's politics. Apart from a few canned platitudes from Prime Minister Jean Chrétien (outside the House, not once inside), there was nothing for a man who served his country through eight prime ministers and some lean years on the Opposition benches. Chrétien was rumoured to have offered Gray a Senate seat, which Gray turned down. A rather lame sop came from Gov.-Gen. Adrienne Clarkson, who awarded the departing Gray the title of Right Honourable. It'll look good on letterhead, but it won't hide the fact that Gray was treated miserably, and that he didn't deserve it.

I wonder whether the Jewish community, especially in his home town of Windsor, will step into the vacuum and stage an event that would afford Gray a proper curtain call.

Another example: Ontario's Progressive Conservative party has been aggressively, and successfully, recruiting Jewish members ever since it introduced the much-awaited tax credit for private school tuition. The Tories had a point: We gave you what you wanted (or a version thereof); now join up.

In a very strange twist, observant Jewish party members not only won't be able to reward the Conservatives, but they also won't be able to choose Premier Mike Harris's successor. That's because the vote to replace Harris, as has been amply reported on these pages, takes place on a Saturday.

No problem, pronounced the party. There's provisions for proxy voting. Just get a fellow party member from your riding to vote for you.

No go. A proxy vote is strictly un-halachic, several rabbis agree, because one cannot ask someone to perform a task that is off-limits to Jews on Shabbat.

This mess is not entirely the party's fault, although it could be fixed with advance polls. The PC executive has turned that idea down but insiders say it's not too late to reverse it and live up to the Tories' lofty standards of inclusion.

All this makes me wonder about two things: Where were Canadian Jewish Congress and Ontario's various rabbinic groups to tell the Tories months ago that a proxy vote was a non-starter for Jews? And, should the Jewish community be so chummy with PC leadership candidate Jim Flaherty, who has implied that Aboriginals are not real people and called for the criminalization of homelessness?

Forget Denmark. Something is rotten in Ottawa and Queen's Park.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Teacher recruitment and retention is the main topic at every Jewish education conference these days. While communities across the continent are opening new day schools, it is apparent that there is a serious shortage of qualified teachers.

In 1973, when I had just become the director of the new Jewish teacher training program at McGill University, my lay chair asked me at a meeting when we could start measuring success. With all of the chutzpah of youth, I said: "When you want your son to be a Hebrew teacher!"

Later that year, following a talk on the status of teachers, a retired Yiddish teacher told me of her pre-war graduation from the Yiddish Lehrerseminar in Vilna, the "Harvard" of eastern European teachers' seminaries. She was from a wealthy Vilna family, but upon graduation was sent to a shtetl to be an alephbais teacher, where the abject poverty shocked her. Every week, however, the community ensured that she had the food she needed and when the cloth merchant arrived in town, bought her fabric for a new dress. She then said to me: "If this community had treated me with the same respect and equality for the last 20 years, I would be a very wealthy woman!"

Our teachers must be given the highest respect because of the sacred task they perform, but they must also earn that respect by being well-trained, highly skilled and totally dedicated to the art of teaching.

While we in Toronto have much to do in this aspect of Jewish education, we can be very proud of the fact that so many of our teachers and educators are native to our own community, were raised in our best schools, and have chosen education as their vocation.

This is no accident. It is the product of community priorities such as the York University Jewish teacher education program, the BJE's Midrasha, academic Jewish studies at two great universities, and a variety of smaller programs in various ideological settings.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

PM affirms support for Israel

Foreign Minister's remarks stir controversy

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Speaking directly to Israeli President Moshe Katsav, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien last week condemned terrorism in unequivocal terms and affirmed Canada's long-standing friendship and support for Israel.

"Let me reaffirm tonight that there is no justification whatsoever for acts of terror against innocent civilians. Canada condemns, without equivocation, the use of violence for political objectives by any state or group," Chrétien said to Katsav, the special guest of the Canada-Israel Committee's 17th Parliamentary Dinner.

"We have called on [Palestinian Authority Chairman] Yasser Arafat to live up to his responsibility and to take strong action against extremist groups," Chrétien said.

On a day when Israel was hit by several terrorist attacks, Chrétien told the more than 1,500 people assembled in Ottawa's Congress Centre that "Canada understands how difficult it is for Israelis to hear calls for patience and restraint. It is very hard to talk about peace in the face of fresh grief and fresh attacks by suicide bombers, but we must continue to talk about peace because there is no alternative for peace."

Exclusive interview with President Katsav

At the conclusion of the CIC Parliamentary Dinner last week, Israeli President Moshe Katsav returned to his suite at Rideau Hall, where he spoke in Hebrew with CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat in an exclusive interview.

Born in Iran in 1945, Katsav came to Israel with his parents in 1951. The eldest of eight children, he grew up in a ma'abara, the new immigrant tent camp that eventually evolved into the city of Kiryat Malachi.

Katsav has a degree in economics and history from Hebrew University. A man of wide political experience, Katsav was first elected to the Knesset on the Likud list in 1977 after a successful career in municipal politics.

From June 1996 to July 1999, Katsav served as minister of tourism, minister in charge of Israeli-Arab affairs and deputy prime minister.

On Aug. 1, 2000, he was sworn in as the eighth president of the State of Israel.

Mr. President, can you please tell us about the morale of Israelis.

"The people of Israel are pained; we are suffering. Each day we absorb heavy blows and the spilling of more blood. It has lasted now for a year-and-a-half. It's only natural that people raise questions; have doubts. They feel great disappointment and anger toward the Palestinian leaders. But all in all, there is a sense of unity that pervades our society because we recognize we have no choice."

Are Israelis able to reach out to the Palestinians?

The News in Brief

CANADA

Fitch Promoted

OTTAWA — The highest-ranking Jewish member of the Canadian Armed Forces has been promoted. Maj.-Gen. Ed Fitch was promoted from brigadier-general, meaning he wears two maple leaves on his uniform, up from one. Fitch is project manager for the Forces' Land Force Reserve Restructure, which oversees the restructuring and modernization of the army reserves.

ISRAEL

Conversion Order

JERUSALEM — Israel's interior minister has refused a court order to recognize non-Orthodox converts. Eli Yishai of the Shas Party said he would go to jail rather than implement the High Court of Justice ruling, which ordered the interior ministry to register Israelis who had Reform or Conservative conversions as Jews on their national identification cards.

Conductor's Plans

JERUSALEM — Conductor Daniel Barenboim plans to lead performances in Jerusalem and Ramallah. Barenboim told a news conference last week that he hoped to succeed where politicians have failed by creating an opportunity for dialogue through music. His plans to meet with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat while in Ramallah prompted accusations that Barenboim is insensitive to the pain of Israelis.

WORLD

Irving Broke

LONDON — Holocaust denier David Irving has been declared bankrupt. A British court took the step last week after Irving failed to pay legal costs to an American professor and her publisher. In 2000, Irving lost a high-profile libel suit he brought against Deborah Lipstadt and her publisher, Penguin Books, after she called Irving a Holocaust denier in her book, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory. At the time, the court ordered Irving to pay Lipstadt and Penguin's legal costs, estimated to be as high as $3.3 million (US). Irving failed to make an interim payment. The bankruptcy order clears the way to seize assets to settle unpaid debts.

Argentine Jews

BUENOS AIRES — The North American federation system has pledged $35 million (US) to help Argentine Jews immigrate to Israel. The funds, which the United Jewish Communities plans to raise and distribute through the Jewish Agency for Israel, come as an increasing number of Argentine Jews seek to flee a deepening economic crisis.

Massacre Marked

MINSK — The 60th anniversary of a Nazi massacre in Belarus was commemorated last week. Over 1,000 mourners and government officials laid flowers and wreaths at a memorial to the 5,000 residents of the Minsk Ghetto who were killed on March 2, 1942. The slayings marked the start of a rampage in which more than 100,000 Minsk Jews were killed.

Jewish Exhibit

VILNIUS — An exhibit documenting the history of Lithuanian Jewry will tour the country after opening last week at the State Jewish Museum here. The display, which details the region's Jewish past since 1370, is slated to be shown in at least eight Lithuanian cities during the next year.

Matzah Ado...

BUDAPEST — Hungarian Jewish leaders are importing matzah in an attempt to avoid repeating last year's shortage, when the country's 100,000 Jews were saved by a last-minute shipment from the Jewish state. Some 15 to 20 tons of matzah, double the normal amount, is coming from Israel.

New Haggadah

NEW YORK — The Judaica Press has published a Haggadah with a new translation and full transliteration. It's described as perfect for those with little or no knowledge of Hebrew. For details, visit judaicapress.com or call 1-800-972-6201.

Porn Charges

ATLANTA — An Atlanta-area rabbi has pleaded guilty to having child pornography on his temple computer. Rabbi Juda Mintz, 59, faces more than two years in prison for possessing at least 10 computer files containing photographs of minors engaging in sexual acts. Mintz allegedly had the files while serving as spiritual leader of Mount Freedom Jewish Centre in Randolph, N.J. According to his lawyer, Mintz now works as a clerk in a convenience store.

Jewish Remains Found in Tasmania

HOBART, Tasmania — Workers excavating a building site last month in Tasmania exposed the remains of some of the 90 Jews buried there between 1828 and 1872.

The site in Hobart, the capital of Tasmania, an island off Australia's southern coast, was last used as a Jewish cemetery 130 years ago.

None of Hobart's Jewish population of about 100 is descended from those buried in the Harrington Street cemetery. Apartments were built over the cemetery site after the land fell into state hands in 1945.

The Tasmanian government's housing commission, which is redeveloping the block of land, made clear that the remains must be treated with dignity and handled only by religious Jews. The government has offered to contribute a small coffin for each set of remains, and a ceremony is being planned for the reburial.

Chai Lifeline to open its first Canadian office

Provides services to seriously ill Jewish children, families

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Chai Lifeline, an international, non-profit organization that provides vital services to seriously ill Jewish children and their families is set to open its first Canadian office in Toronto.

Through its regional offices across the United States, and in England and Israel, Chai Lifeline maintains a network of psychosocial support programs that include medical referrals, emotional support groups, bone marrow drives, trips and holiday festivities, recreational activities and toy drives.

As well, it runs Camp Simcha, a kosher, residential summer camp for seriously ill children, and the Stella K. Abraham Respite Center, a country getaway for Jewish families coping with catastrophic illness.

Featured at a recent dinner to kick-off Chai Lifeline in Canada, were Rabbi Simcha Scholar, founder and executive vice-president of Chai Lifeline, and Toronto Argonauts owner Sherwood Schwarz who is on the organization's board of directors.

Several members of the Toronto Argonauts Football club also turned out to support the project. They included president Michael "Pinball" Clemons; general manager Paul Masotti; Dan Ferrone, vice-president operations and special projects, and a former offensive lineman; receiver Andre Talbot; and kicker Noel Prefontaine.

Rabbi Scholar, who started Chai Lifeline in 1986 in New York as a community project to help eight seriously ill children go to summer camp, said the camp can now accommodate about 300 children – many are Canadian – who usually attend for two weeks.

Rabbi Simcha Scholar

One Camp Simcha camper who spoke at the dinner said he was introduced to Chai Lifeline after being diagnosed with leukemia about two years ago.

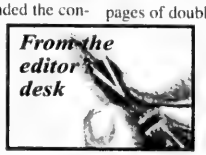
Testimonies of support

There were many moving "testimonies" last week of Canadians' support for Israel at the two-day Canada-Israel Committee gathering in Ottawa. I make note here of three them, which in my opinion, were among the most poignant.

• People from one coast to the other and from all walks of life attended the conference. That they would set aside the time, the resources and in many cases even the income, to travel such very large distances, whether from Vancouver or Halifax, or indeed any point in between to be in Ottawa, is deserving of high praise.



• Students from middle school, high school and university were highly visible at the event. Like spicing that is felt as well as seen, they enlivened the proceedings; they elicited from the meetings a fuller, deeper, more "piquant" flavouring than would have otherwise been felt. The student presence was yet another reason we older folks could feel great pride.

So noticeable were the students' contributions to the two-day event that at the Parliamentary Dinner itself, both the National Chairman of the CIC, Joseph Wilder and the Israeli Ambassador to Canada, Chaim Divon, singled them out for special praise.

• The downtown business section of Ottawa and the approaches to the downtown area were festooned with Israeli and Canadian flags. It was an-out-of-the-ordinary but deeply comforting sight. They fluttered and snapped side by side on every street corner. And against the pale blue of the late winter sky, the deep reds, deep blues and deep perfect white of the two countries' flags were a radiant symmetry of colour and poise that touched the emotions.

Not surprisingly, many speeches were delivered over the course of the two days. The speech that captured most of the headlines was the one delivered by Foreign Minister Bill Graham to a luncheon gathering Wednesday afternoon. Graham spoke for nearly half an hour, delivering a message of some 16 pages of double-spaced text.

Reportage of the speech, however, could be studied in political science classrooms as a paradigm of the way in which reality occasionally bears little resemblance to perception.

The media seized on two items from the minister's 16-page pre-distributed text: one sentence that he actually spoke and two sentences that he did not.

The sentence he spoke was a note of caution, and a mild one at that, directed to the government of Israel. "Innocent civilian casualties, no matter their background or religion, are not justifiable and compromise Israel's image as a vital and compassionate nation."

The two sentences that were in the written text but which the minister omitted in the oral presentation were examples of the Israeli policy that might "compromise Israel's image," namely the demolition of houses and incursions into refugee camps.

The fact that the minister refrained from citing the two examples could have been reasonably interpreted as an attempt to "soften" the message to Israel. It is clear that the media interpreted the omission that way because they descended upon him, after the speech, with boisterous aggression at the media scrum, challenging him to explain it.

The ensuing inaccurate media portrayal both of the speech and of its reception by the audience focused on the minister's statement of caution.

Ignored by the media were the speech's two key features:

• It was overwhelmingly positive toward Israel.

• What irritated most listeners was the minister's total silence on Canada's vexing, generally anti-Israel, voting record at the UN and affiliated agencies.

A speech that captured no headlines at all was the response by Israel's President Moshe Katsav to the thoughtful, eloquent and highly informed toast to the people of Israel by Governor General Adrienne Clarkson at the state dinner in the president's honour Thursday night.

The following are excerpts from his remarks:

"I would like to thank you, the Governor General of Canada, Madam Adrienne Clarkson, for your warm and friendly welcome. My visit to Canada is an expression of the strong friendship that exists between the people of Israel and the people of Canada.

"The common values between Israel and Canada were recently demonstrated during the Durban Conference in South Africa when a meeting against racism became a meeting against Jews and Israel. Canada took a leading role in this struggle...

"Canada is appreciated by the Israeli society and you are one of our best allies... The two countries have mutual values and mutual goals...

"Your Excellency... I have learned a lot about Canada, your achievements, values and culture.

"I love Canada. I admire your spirit and your dedication to human values.

"I would like to raise a toast to you, to the great Canadian people, and to the friendship between Canada and Israel. I hope that my visit further enhances the excellent relations between our two states. L'chaim."

—MBD

Saudi plan could mean peace with Syria: expert

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel and Syria may well resume bilateral talks if Saudi Arabia's peace proposal gains momentum, says Moshe Maoz, one of Israel's leading experts on Syria.

Syria shows no interest in resuming negotiations, which broke off two years ago after both sides came tantalizingly close to signing an agreement, noted Maoz, a Hebrew University historian.

Syria's current policy is that Israel's dispute with the Palestinians must be settled before talks with Israel can begin again. "The Syrians regard the Palestinian question as a priority, and they mean it."

Besides, Maoz pointed out in a recent interview, Israel and Syria are just too far apart on key issues. "The gap between [Israeli Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon and [Syrian President] Bashar Assad is very huge."

But if the Saudi plan takes off, Israel and Syria could well find themselves talking again, said Maoz, who was here on a lecture tour sponsored by Israel's consulate.

Saudi Arabia has floated a plan that would offer Israel full normalization with the Arab world in exchange for a full Israeli pullout from lands captured in the 1967 Six Day War.

The plan, described by the Saudis as a vision rather than a blueprint, has yet to be formally presented.

Maoz said that Assad wants peace, but only on his late father's terms: a full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

"I doubt very much whether Sharon will buy the Syrian terms," said Maoz. "Sharon might give the Syrians two-thirds of the Golan, but that's only a hunch."

However, if the Saudi initiative is accepted, if the United States can provide attractive incentives to Israel and if Syria agrees to a demilitarization of the Golan, Sharon may rethink his position.

"Sharon is not an ideologue," Maoz said. "He's very pragmatic."

Assad, he explained, desires peace for a variety of reasons.

Syria wants to be removed from the U.S. list of states sponsoring terrorism so that it can attract American and overseas investment capital. "For this, Assad needs peace with Israel."

Syria's economy, he noted, is much smaller than Israel's, and the Syrian middle-class yearns for stability, which would come with peace.

Syria also realizes that it is no match for Israel militarily.

"The balance of power favours Israel," said Maoz, whose forthcoming book is entitled Modern Syria: Political and Socio-Economic Development. "Israel is 100 times stronger than Syria."

"The Syrian army is very weak," he added. "The only thing they have are long-range missiles, and they're meant for deterrence rather than attack."

And if Syria regains the Golan, Assad, who succeeded his father almost two years ago, will bolster his legitimacy.

Maoz said there is little support in Israel for relinquishing the Golan.

"At most, 50 per cent of Israelis support a complete withdrawal in return for peace. But, as you know, things could change. Remember Sinai and Sadat?"

Before Anwar Sadat's historic trip to Israel in 1977, Israel opposed a pullout from the Sinai Peninsula. After his visit, Israel and Egypt launched talks that eventually resulted in a full Israeli withdrawal from Sinai.

Moshe Maoz

Maoz said that Syria expects no less than what Egypt obtained in exchange for a peace treaty with Israel: a total withdrawal.

Recalling Israel's talks with Syria in 1999 and 2000, Maoz said that the fundamental stumbling block was a small strip of territory in the northeast corner of the Sea of Galilee about seven kilometres long and from 100 to 200 metres wide.

Israel refused to give it up, while Syria demanded it.

Ehud Barak, then Israel's prime minister, passed up the chance to make peace with Syria over this pivotal issue.

Nor was Barak interested in an idea, floated by British journalist Patrick Seale, to turn that section of the Sea of Galilee's shoreline into an international tourist area under joint Israeli-Syrian sovereignty.

"It was a missed opportunity," said Maoz, who served as one of Barak's advisors during this period. "Barak thought he wouldn't be able to muster domestic support for this sort of a withdrawal."

If Israel and Syria had reached a deal, Maoz speculated, the Palestinian uprising may never have erupted.

An agreement would have enabled Israel to make a phased, orderly withdrawal from its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon.

Instead, Israel withdrew hastily, under fire from Hezbollah. The Palestinians concluded from this episode that they, too, could mount a successful resistance to Israel's occupation.

The Syrians, he said, have no interest in inflaming Israel's tense border with Lebanon.

"Syria will keep a tight lid on Hezbollah," he said. "Syria doesn't want to give Israel a pretext to attack. Syria got the message last year when we bombed two of their radar stations in Lebanon. And the Syrians know we could bomb their barracks and bases in [Lebanon's] Bekaa Valley."

Syria will occasionally tolerate a token shelling by Hezbollah of Israeli positions in the Shabaa Farms area, but no more than that. (The Shabaa Farms area is located on the disputed border between Lebanon and the Golan.)

Maoz does not foresee an improvement of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's testy relationship with Syria.

"The Syrians don't like Arafat. He signed the Oslo accords behind their backs. Arafat wants independence from Syria. Syria wants to control him. That's the story in a nutshell. I doubt Arafat will be going to Damascus any time soon for talks with Bashar."

Israel has reason to be concerned by the rapprochement between Syria and Iraq. But they are not likely to form a military alliance against Israel, he observed.

Maoz, who wrote a biography of Hafez Assad, has little respect for his son and successor, Bashar.

"He shows no leadership qualities. He just survives. The military controls him. He doesn't have his father's qualities, his toughness, his deceitfulness, his sense of timing, his strategic thinking. Hafez Assad was an experienced leader. Bashar is a spoiled child."

Jewish MPs create new organization

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a longstanding advocate of human rights with a client list that includes Natan Sharansky and Nelson Mandela, Irwin Cotler is sensitive to the issues of racial discrimination.

In the past, he has come to the defence of individuals who have been victims of hate crimes, but today he believes there has been a shift on the international scene in which the State of Israel has become the quintessential "Jew," subject to racist and differential treatment.

At a meeting in Israel earlier this year, Cotler and a group of Jewish parliamentarians from around the world, concerned about what Cotler calls "the new anti-Semitism expressed as a universal phenomenon," created the International Parliamentary Assembly of Jewish Members and Former Members of Parliament and Legislators (IPA).

The assembly has been mandated to promote human rights and tolerance, combat racism and anti-Semitism, urge conflict resolution through peaceful means and promote model legislation on anti-terrorism and anti-racism.

It will also establish a clearing house amongst members, facilitating the exchange of information and updating members on related developments around the world.

The assembly was created at a gathering in Israel of Jewish parliamentarians at the 6th International Conference of Jewish Ministers and Members of Parliament, an event co-ordinated by the Israeli Knesset, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Jewish Agency and the Israel Forum, a non-profit volunteer organization that works to strengthen Diaspora-Israel ties. Senator Jerry Grafstein and retired senator Sheila Finestone joined Cotler and legislators from the United States, the Czech Republic and South Africa in proposing the creation of IPA.

"Setting up a parliamentary assembly is reflective and representative of our common heritage and tradition," Cotler explained. As the process of globalization continues, the assembly marks an expression of multiculturalism and the Jewish identity on the world stage, while maintaining a commitment to democracy, human rights and the rule of law.

The approximately 65 Jewish parliamentarians who attended the conference agreed racism in the Diaspora has become a serious problem, said Cotler, MP for the Montreal riding of Mount Royal.

"There was a clear consensus that a world conference against racism [in Durban, S.A.] had turned into a conference of racism against Israel and the Jewish people," he said.

In addition, concern was voiced over a recent meeting of the Geneva Convention's contracting parties, who singled out Israel as the first state in 50 years with an indictment read against it, he said. Such a meeting was never convened to address the mass murders and killing fields of Rwanda, Cambodia or Bosnia, he added.

The UN Conference on Human Rights, he continued, "singled out Israel, and the real human rights perpetrators got exculpatory immunity."

The UN has never even been critical of China or Iran, he pointed out.

The world bodies violated the principles of universality and equality for all nations, he continued. "This is really a manifestation of anti-Jewishness, which undermines the entire regime of international law.

"As parliamentarians, we felt it deeply that the struggle against racism had undermined the United Nation's authority and diminished the whole regime of international human rights law."

In addition to launching the assembly, the conference passed a resolution that called upon "our nations' Red Cross/Red Crescent societies to… withhold annual dues from the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies until such time as time as the federation admits Magen David Adom to full membership."

The exclusion of Magen David Adom is "an historic wrong" that must be corrected. Such a step would enhance humanitarian relief, Cotler stated.

While Cotler declined to describe the exclusion for over 50 years of the MDA from the Red Cross/Red Crescent societies an example of modern anti-Jewishness, he said there have been many manifestations of such activity in recent years. The modern phenomenon has spun off from politically incorrect "classical anti-Semitism." Instead discrimination and the denial of national peoplehood and particularity is aimed exclusively at the Jews.

Cotler believes the Palestinians, with whom Israel has been at conflict for more than 50 years, "have mainstreamed their case and cause in the human rights culture. When that cause began to assume anti-Jewish dimensions, that also began to make its way and be mainstreamed into the human-rights culture."

Advocacy for genocidal anti-Semitism is current in Hamas and Islamic Jihad propaganda and their founding charters call for the destruction of Israel and the killing of Jews, who are referred to as descendants of apes and monkeys, Cotler said.

That demonization is characteristic of Nazi propaganda, yet "I don't see anything in the media that holds them to account."

Cotler points out part of IPA's mandate is a "combat the scourge of racism, anti-Semitism, xenophobia and the denial of the Holocaust."

Chai Lifeline to open in Toronto

I didn't even want to go to camp, but people from the organization encouraged me. It was the best thing I ever did. I was emotionally uplifted.

"The connection and bonding with counsellors and other sick children gave me the strength to face my treatments. By opening an office here, other children can benefit like I did."

Chai Lifeline, which runs on a budget of about $11 million (US), and serves about 3,000 families, is an "absolutely special organization," said Rabbi Scholar.

"It runs the gamut of Jews in the community from ponytails to payot. Illness is something that brings people together; a mother is a mother, a child is a child, and pain is pain.

"I've seen chassidic men talk with unaffiliated women; we've bridged the gap in the community," he said.

When a Toronto committee asked him to help open an office here, he jumped at the chance, said Rabbi Scholar. "The fact that they want the office here means that there is something very special about the Toronto community.

"I came because I believe there are hundreds of families who need our programs. This event is the springboard; I believe people really want Chai Lifeline open here."

Schwarz, who lives in New York, was the organization's first dinner honoree in 1986. He said his first visit to Camp Simcha was an "incredible experience.

"I saw ill children having a wonderful time. They were together with other children who were going through the same thing, and who all understood each other. No one was different.

"I'm thrilled to see a Chai Lifeline office open in Toronto. It's a pleasure to participate in the project."

MDA foreign affairs co-ordinator killed in ambush

Volunteer visited The CJN in November

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Palestinian intifadah has been raging for 17 months, creating a steady stream of casualties. For many Canadian Jews, news of Israeli fatalities and injuries is troubling, even shocking, but nothing compares to the feeling when one of the dead is someone you know personally.

Staff at The CJN and volunteers with Canadian Friends of Magen David Adom (MDA) were saddened to hear that Yochai Porat, MDA's co-ordinator of foreign volunteers, was killed last week in an ambush.

Porat, 26, visited The CJN in late November while in Toronto to publicize the work that Magen David Adom accomplishes under trying conditions. Not only does the agency, the Israeli counterpart to the Red Cross, provide most of Israel's ambulance and blood services, but its drivers serve people on both sides of the Green Line, including Arabs.

Porat was here as part of a North American trip to recruit volunteers and help raise funds to replace the 57 ambulances destroyed (at that time) by Palestinians.

Ambulance personnel serve as "first responders" to horrible events, like the Sbarro Pizza bombing in Jerusalem, he explained.

Last week, Porat was killed while providing first response to comrades shot by a Palestinian sniper. Porat was on reserve army duty as a medic when he responded to the sniper attack about 1.5 kilometres from Ofra on the West Bank. He was one of 10 Israelis shot by the sniper in the attack.

He was killed, according to an Israel Foreign Ministry obituary, while trying to help his wounded comrades.

In his brief visit to The CJN newsroom, Porat was warm, personable and down-to-earth, and he seemed to accept the dangers of his job without flinching. A senior medic, he worked as a first responder in the Jerusalem area, facing danger repeatedly.

During his 10-year stint as a volunteer with Magen David Adom, he helped save people wounded in terror attacks, including the Dolphinarium night-club bombing in Tel Aviv, and those injured at the Versailles banquet hall disaster in Jerusalem.

Last month, he had a more pleasant task, thanking U.S. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who had distributed diplomas to student volunteers during a visit to Israel.

A Sgt. Maj. in the Israeli reserves, Porat was buried in the Kfar Sava military cemetery. He is survived by his parents, a brother and a sister.

Shira Honig, a CJN copy editor, met Porat briefly.

"I hardly knew him, but what I did know I remember well because of the circumstances in which we met. It was after his CJN interview and he needed a way to get to his next appointment. I was in a hurry to get home. So we decided to get a cab together and as I ran down the stairs to call one, I tripped and fell. I later found out that I had sprained my foot, but at the time, all I knew was that I was in a lot of pain.

"As I hobbled to a colleague's car [for a lift part way to a subway station], Yochai told me his glasses were broken and he was having trouble seeing. We were laughing, but between the two of us, we managed to hail a cab. He checked my foot – I was so happy he was a medic – and then we talked about his visit to Chicago as part of his recent tour across the United States and about music. He said he loved the saxophone.

"I can't wrap my head around his death. I still see him sitting next to me in the car."

More information about Porat can be found at the MDA Web site: www.magendavidadom.org.

SPECTACULAR MODEL SHOWCASE OPENS THIS SPRING

Islamist Web site removed

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The presence in Canada of a Web site that threatened attacks against the United States should not come as much of a surprise, since "there are a fair amount of Hezbollah supporters" in Canada, according to an expert on radical Islam in North America.

Extremist Islamic groups pose "a danger to all Canadians, in terms of what these groups can do," said Steven Emerson, author of the recently released American Jihad: The Terrorists Living Among Us.

The Investigative Project, a Washington, D.C.-based organization headed by Emerson, recently discovered that the Web site of a hardline Iranian Islamic group, Ansar-e-Hezbollah, was hosted on a server operated by GT Group Telecom Services, a Toronto Internet service provider.

The company removed the Web site once Emerson's findings were published in the National Post.

However, last week, the BBC reported that the leader of Ansar-e-Hezbollah has promised to create a new Web presence.

Hamid Ustad vowed to relaunch the site, which had been used to recruit volunteers to carry out worldwide suicide attacks. The original one was created in response to U.S. President George W. Bush's denunciation of Iran, along with Iraq and North Korea, as part of an "axis of evil," the BBC reported.

The Ansar-e Hezbollah site invited prospective martyrs to register for suicide attacks in the event of a U.S. military strike against Iran, reported BBC analyst Sadeq Saba.

Ansar-e Hezbollah is one of the most extreme Islamic groups in Iran, with suspected links with hardliners in the Iranian leadership.

It has been reportedly resorting to vigilante tactics on Iranian university campuses, using clubs and chains on students who had demanded reform, while police authorities turned a blind eye.

McGuinty criticized for stand on education tax credit

TORONTO — In a rare joint declaration, Canadian Jewish Congress and the Islamic Society of North America-Canada have issued a letter criticizing Ontario Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty for promising to rescind the provincial education tax credit for independent schools.

The two organizations say they are disappointed at McGuinty's stand, particularly since he has never come up with his own plan for funding independent religious schools, even though Roman Catholic schools receive full government support.

"We are disappointed because you and the Liberal party have acknowledged the discrimination of the past, but your only proposal is to perpetuate it," the letter states.

The letter also asks McGuinty, "If denominational education at public expense was good enough for you, why isn't it good enough for us?"

Ed Morgan, chair of Congress' Ontario region, said the two community organizations quickly drafted the letter after McGuinty's comments at a Liberal fund-raiser were published. McGuinty said he would eliminate the education tax credit, enacted under the current Tory government, that allows families to claim tax credits for private school tuition. The credits max out at $3,500 per student in five years.

McGuinty's proposal "impacts on minority rights and he should be more sensitive to that," Morgan said. — P.L.

Kosher Gourmet Gala raises $70,000 to feed hungry

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Here's a tried and true recipe for success from the kitchens of Mazon Canada.

Start with one large, elegantly-appointed concert hall, blend in a multiplicity of delicacies prepared by 32 kosher caterers, add a team of dedicated volunteers, toss liberally with wine and desserts, and garnish with a "marketplace decor."

Then, to kick it up to notches yet unknown, offer guests a surprise draw with prizes ranging from a day at the spa to botox injections.

What you'll have in the end, besides a relaxed reveller and a wrinkle-free gourmand, is the fourth annual Kosher Gourmet Gala. Sponsored by Mazon Canada, a 16-year-old agency that raises money for organizations that feed the hungry, the gala was the most successful yet, raising $70,000. The funds are earmarked for the agency's May round of allocations, when they will be distributed along with other funds to dozens of grassroots Canadian hunger-relief organizations.

The gala continues to be a very popular community event, with a sold-out crowd of 780 gathering this year at Roy Thomson Hall, said Jacqueline Kott-Wolle, executive-director of Mazon.

"Mazon Canada focuses on food-centred events to heighten awareness within the Jewish community of the need to address hunger," said Susan Davis, the event's chair. "It is an enduring Jewish ethic to remember suffering in the midst of happiness. Our Kosher Gourmet Gala does just that, and something more, because it allows its supporters to address the suffering as well as remember it while partaking in the evening's offerings."

These volunteers helped make the Kosher Gourmet Gala a success.

In addition to raising funds, the event showcased the range of kosher products available in the city, all of which were donated by caterers and suppliers.

Participants paid $50 a person, though premium "category donations," such as "sponsor," "patron" and "friend" started at $250.

Mazon has maintained its volume of donations in difficult economic times, although the number of category donations seems to have dropped a little, Kott-Wolle indicated.

The last two rounds of allocations in 2001 were off from previous years. In its fall distribution, Mazon allocated $292,995, down from $348,730 the year before. In its spring round, it gave out $207,250, down from $325,402 in 2000. Mazon allocated a total of $500,245 in 2001, down from $674,132 the year before.

Unusually high contributions in earlier years helped boost the corresponding allocation figures, Kott-Wolle said. A single donor gave $200,000 to Mazon and that sum was spent over several allocations. The same contributor gave another $70,000 last year, she added.

Meanwhile, Mazon continues to raise its profile round the country. Five years ago, the organization could boast 3,000 names on its mailing list. This year, the number soared to 8,000.

The strength of the organization remains in Toronto and Montreal, though some efforts have been made to encourage satellite offices in other Jewish communities. Organizers fret over whether to pursue that course more vigorously. Such an effort would require time and resources and cut back on the funds available for allocation, Kott-Wolle said.

Montreal, meanwhile, continues to lead the way with its big-event programming. The Montreal Food Fest, that community's gala event, attracted 1,000 people and raised about $210,000.

Kott-Wolle attributed the success of the Montreal event to that community's experience in organizing large galas and to the greater number of participants who purchase premium category tickets. "They have a really active team of committee members pushing for more money," she said.

Mazon also raises funds from the sale of place cards and greeting cards, from a voluntary tithing of a portion of the food bills from simchas, like weddings and bar/bat mitzvahs, and from the sale of Mazon loot bags for kids' parties.

In its last round of allocations in the fall of 2001, Mazon supported dozens of organizations from coast to coast with sums ranging from $500 to $6,000. Among the recipients were: Medicine Hat and District Food Bank ($4,000); Jewish Child and Family Services, Winnipeg ($3,600); Food Bank Moncton ($1,500) and Tomchei Shabbos, Toronto ($6,000).

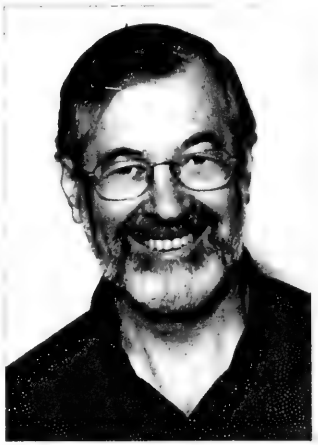
17th-century talent meets 21st in Beth Tikvah concert

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN



Srul Irving Glick

TORONTO — The music of 17th-century Italian composer Salamone (Shlomo) de Rossi and Srul Irving Glick, one of Canada's most prolific and acclaimed composers, will highlight the Fourth Annual Spring Gala Concert of Music at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Sunday, March 17, at 8 p.m.

"Salamone Rossi is a genius and what is remarkable is that he was a religious Jew who in 1623 wrote a large body of Jewish music using Hebrew texts," says Glick, the composer-in-residence at Beth Tikvah, where he has also been choir director since 1969.

"[Rossi] wrote in the prevailing style of the late Renaissance and the music is written with a complete understanding of the Hebrew text and with superb musical technique."

The first half of the program will feature a lecture on Rossi by Glick, followed by a performance of Rossi's music, consisting of six pieces for strings and six choral pieces. The second half will feature Glick's Music for Passover for choir and string quartet.

Glick will conduct the concert, which will feature the Beth Tikvah Choir and special guests the Festival String Quartet.

Rossi, an observant Jew born in Mantua, Italy in 1570, became well- known for his contribution to the development of the trio sonata and chamber duet.

Through his connection with the Gonzaga court, he published his first work, the Canzonette for Three Voices, in 1589, followed by madrigals and sinfonias, all at a time when Jews wore yellow badges and lived in the ghetto.

He later lost favour with the court because he was Jewish and joined Jewish theatrical troupes that played a significant role in theatrical life, not only in the ghetto but also in the wider Christian community.

Rossi is known for Hashirim Asher liSh'lomo (The Songs of Solomon), a collection of 33 polyphonic settings of Hebrew psalms, hymns and synagogal songs.

Title-page of Salamone de Rossi's Hashirim Asher liSh'lomo.

Glick says, "I relate to this music on the level of Monteverdi or Bach. I always found it difficult to find repertoire that I truly enjoy conducting and Rossi is one of those people who continuously refreshes me."

Glick, 67, who has been battling multiple myeloma, a virulent form of bone and blood cancer, for 3½ years, says he belives his "work as a composer prolongs my life. It is both healing and prayerful and rewarding."

Speaking of his career as a composer, conductor, teacher and lecturer, Glick says, "The measure of a great piece of music is the fact that the listener is deeply moved by it.

"To me, it is incredibly gratifying – the personal contact – the letters and calls I receive from people who love my music."

Glick's compositions have been performed throughout the world. He has also received numerous awards including the prestigious Ateret Kavod Award (Crown of Honour) from the United Synagogue of America and the Yuval Award from the Cantors Assembly of America for his "lifelong commitment to the composition of music that captures the heart and touches the soul." He was appointed a Member of the Order of Canada in 1994.

Glick says he is aware of pain, suffering and the evil in the world, but he chooses to stress the positive. "One can see the world in darkness or turn it to see the light and beauty, with the realization that every moment is precious."

Despite his ongoing chemotherapy, Glick is working on a number of projects, including the Seven Tableaux from Song of Songs for the Victoria Scholars Choir, conducted by Jerzey Cihochi, which will be performed June 16 at the Toronto International Choral Festival.

Tickets for the Beth Tikvah concert are $10 in advance and $15 at the door. For tickets, call 416-221-3433, ext. 0, or fax, 416-221-1602..

Mezuzot fund-raiser to aid victims of terror

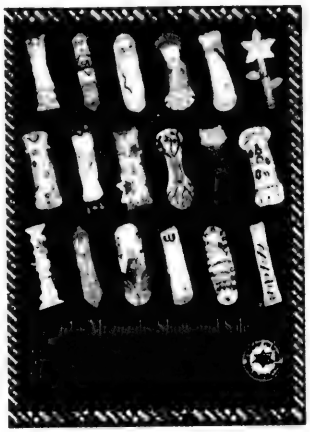
By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prayers for peace sometimes come in different shapes and sizes.

Over the past few months, close to a thousand participants – from 18 different organizations and from more than half the Jewish schools in the city – have been creating mezuzot out of clay that will be sold at a Kids for Kids fundraiser on March 31.

Kids for Kids is an organization centred in Israel that encourages Jewish youth around the world to help children who have been left orphaned, maimed and traumatized as a result of terrorism.

Initially, D'vorah Hoffman, a Kids for Kids volunteer, hoped to have 613 mezuzot available for sale.



"I chose that number because there are 613 mitzvot," Hoffman said in an interview. But, she said, the community's response has been "amazing" and she now has more than 850 mezuzot for the sale. Hoffman has also involved schools in Memphis and Detroit in the project.

The project began when Hoffman wanted to find some way to help out with the current situation in Israel. At the same time, she felt there was a need to teach children here about tzedakah and the importance of giving.

Hoffman studied art at the Ontario College of Art and over the past few years has used art as a way to teach children and adults with learning difficulties.

Drawing on her skills as a teacher and ceramic artist, she decided to approach schools and offer kids the opportunity to make mezuzot in their art classes. As the schools began to respond positively, she found the only constraint was her time.

In each classroom, Hoffman has tried to integrate different educational goals.

"Teaching art is like teaching philosophy," she said. "It's about reaching personal goals and being satisfied with your own work."

It was also important for her to be able to teach kids about the importance of tzedakah and the quality of giving.

Unfortunately, "we're raising our children to be park bears," she said. "Everything is always given to them and they're never actually involved in the act of giving."

Kids don't usually have the money to donate themselves, Hoffman said, noting that "this project allows them to give of themselves in a direct and meaningful way."

After producing a mezuzah, each child has to price their own piece.

"They need to put a worth on their work and effort – which is part of the educational process," she said.

All the pieces will be collected and sold at the sale at Shaarei Shamayim Synagogue. The mezuzot will be shown from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. and the sale will run from 1 p.m. to 3 p.m. and 7 p.m. to 9 p.m.

Assessing Canada-Israel relations

Last week's two-day congress in Ottawa sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee, culminating with the 17th Parliamentary Dinner, was an appropriate occasion to briefly assess Canada-Israel relations. By any measure, the two-day gathering was a great success and the bilateral relationship that it highlighted is very strong.

The most obvious measure of the conference's success was the rather overwhelming fact that more than 1,500 people attended the dinner. It was a very poignant, palpable demonstration of the astounding support by Canadians – not all of them Jews, and a great many of them Canadian parliamentarians, senators, civil and public servants, judges and other officials – for Israel and its more than half-century struggle for an enduring, secure and peaceful place in the Middle East.

There were other demonstrations of that support as well such as:

- the very holding of a state dinner in honour of the president of Israel – and through him, the people of Israel – in the midst of Israel's most perilous and troubled times in nearly three decades, and
- the unequivocal, unambiguous statement by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien concerning Israel's future: "There can be no lasting peace in the Middle East without a full guaranty of a safe and secure Israel."

It is important to point out that there are indeed variances between Canadian and Israeli foreign policy in the Middle East. Could anyone reasonably expect that there would not be? Could anyone reasonably expect that there should not be? The two nations are distinct sovereign countries with different histories, different images of themselves, different interpretations of geo-political situations, different places in the globe and different roles in the global arena.

Canada fully understands and accepts Israel's right to defend itself against its enemies. The foreign minister was very clear about this. At the same time, however, Canada appears to have doubts over some of the methods of self-defence Israel employs. The foreign minister was equally clear on this. But, contrary to the impression conveyed by the press during the conference, neither in the foreign minister's speech Wednesday afternoon nor in the prime minister's speech in the evening, was there any comparison of moral equivalence between the terror committed by the Palestinians and the self-defence practised by Israel.

Regrettably too, the subject of Canada's disturbing voting record at the United Nations was essentially overlooked at the conference, due in large part to the distraction generated by the media coverage of Foreign Minister Bill Graham's presentation. However, Canadians may now have a new standard by which to measure future Canadian voting at the UN in the form of the commitment made by the prime minister during his dinner address: "Canada will oppose the effort to undermine the legitimacy of Israel at the United Nations or at any other international forums." In all, it is fair to say, relations between Canada and Israel are strong, though with room, still, for improvement.

Chrétien inappropriate speaker

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) was mistaken when it selected Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to be the keynote speaker at the 17th CIC Parliamentary conference held in Ottawa to honour the President of Israel Moshe Katsav.

It is an undeniable affront to the State of Israel and the Jewish community. For the past several years, the federal Liberal cabinet and its backbenchers have acknowledged and supported United Nations resolutions tabled and convened by an absolutely anti-Semitic coalition of Arab States that vilify the State of Israel.

Save the children

Suicide bombers are the vilest of villains. Their continuing acts of violence, perpetrated literally on innocent children of Israel, rip at our hearts.

In the past few years, in almost epidemic proportions, Israeli parents have been forced to mourn beyond our wildest nightmares. How can there be anything but disbelief as Israeli children are brutally murdered by demonic ideologues, invisible cowards covering their faces with the blood of others, who blaspheme the name of God in the name of "freedom"?

The system that educates suicide bombers feeds on ignorance and deifies murder. Is it not time for Arab parents to recognize that they have been manipulated and cheated by leaders who radicalize their children to become suicide bombers? All must be done to save the children who are the targets of killers and the children who are targeted to become killers.

Enlightened parents do not look at children as tools of war.

Reader applauds America

I am a Canadian, a Jew and an infidel, and on behalf of many other Canadian infidels and Jews, I would first like to thank the Americans for Afghanistan. We are in awe of the clean, swift action that you took against the terrorists.

I also want to thank the Americans for trying to clean up the Middle East mess. We've pretty much gotten the message that the Palestinian terrorists are spiritual brothers to the terrorists of Sept. 11. They are religious fanatics whose mission is to destroy Jews and infidels. What they do is stroll over to Jerusalem and kill people.

In the fullness of time, I expect that the Canadians in power will do the right thing and give the Americans a hand. We are a cautious bunch. In a year or two, we might speak out against Palestinian terrorism, and, in due course, we might send some soldiers into "Palestine" to rout out the terrorists and confiscate the nail bombs and grenades and guns and missiles.

And then we can look forward to some really productive Palestinian-Israel peace talks. That is, if there still is an Israel.

Reader objects to letters

Is it not time for The CJN to declare a moratorium on those self-congratulatory letters deserving the Israelis' gratitude to Jewish tourists? Israelis don't owe us anything, and I doubt many of them would think of two weeks in five-star hotels as the ultimate expression of patriotic fervour. Yes, there's something to be said for not cowering before terrorists and some Israelis may have said so, but basking in their compliments strikes me as unseemly.

Holocaust studies important

I applaud the schools in North America and abroad who teach Holocaust studies ("Polish schools begin teaching Holocaust studies," CJN, Feb. 28). It's very important to spread awareness of anti-Semitism and racism. I also agree with Mr. Trojanski, who said in the article that students who have known the horrors of the Holocaust through their families or otherwise are more likely to be well informed and tolerant of this horror. He poses a very important question: "What can be done to prevent [the Holocaust] from happening again?" The answer is nothing, unless all nations wholeheartedly agree to cease hate, fear, torture and discrimination.

I'm sorry if I seem somewhat of a pessimist. My heart goes out to all Holocaust survivors and to Mr. Trojanski.

We must care about ourselves

I agree and share Gail Asper's sentiments regarding the community's response to anti-Israel reporting (CJN, Feb. 21).

I have always taken it upon myself to address outrageous and offensive lies and distortions pertaining to Isrel and the complex Middle East conflict through letters to MPs, government ministers and newspapers.

The point is, if we don't care about ourselves enough to stand up and be counted, who will?

One doesn't have to be very knowledgeable to see through lop-sided reporting.

'Our Canadian ties to Israel run deep'

Realization of an unselfish ideal is inspiring

The following is the address delivered by Governor General Adrienne Clarkson at the state dinner in honour of Moshe Katsav, president of the State of Israel, and Mrs. Gila Katsav, at Rideau Hall, Thursday, March 7.

President Katsav, it is a pleasure to welcome you and Mrs. Katsav to our home at the residence of the Governor General of Canada, Rideau Hall.

We are pleased to welcome you, the head of state of a democracy, to our country, which is, we are proud to say, also a well-functioning democracy. Democracies not only permit but also encourage the public exchange of ideas about civil society. And it is because of this democratic tradition that my husband, John Ralston Saul, regrettably is not able to be with us tonight. He is in Vancouver hosting the LaFontaine-Baldwin Lecture, commemorating the beginning of responsible government in Canada. The lecture is given this year for the first time by our Aboriginal leader, Georges Erasmus. Only such an important commitment could have prevented my husband from participating tonight in welcoming you here.

Governor General Adrienne Clarkson

I think this kind of functioning democracy, which Israel and Canada both enjoy, has its advantages and disadvantages, depending on your point of view. The advantage is a free society in which people are open and able to discuss things, quarrel with each other and raise their voices, always knowing that they have recourse to elections to decide who will represent them.

The other side of democracy is that it is notoriously inefficient and takes a long time and sometimes people become impatient with it. But you know, just as we know here in Canada the words of Winston Churchill: it is still a better system than any other that has been invented.

The Talmud says: "In Jerusalem, the men of discrimination did not sit down to dine in company until they knew who their companions were to be." I know a bit about who you are. I know that you arrived in the new state of Israel as a young boy in 1951. And that your family was sent to an immigrant tent camp in what is now Kiryat Malachi. And that, 18 years later, you were elected mayor of that settlement, the youngest mayor ever to be elected in Israel. In 1977, you were elected to the Knesset, of which you have been a member for 25 years. And now you are president of the State of Israel. That's not bad for a boy from Yazd in Iran.

I, too, as you know, am an immigrant. So we have much in common in our backgrounds. I came to this country when I was three years old, and received my education through the grace of a public education system which sets out to make all our immigrants citizens of our country. As I often have said, this place, Ottawa, where I came as a child, was a cold, white place in a cold, white country. In my lifetime, in the past 60 years, it has become a place of enormous diversity and energy and a successful experiment in the new kind of pluralist country that Canada has since become.

Four years ago, CBC Radio's Writers and Company broadcast an Israeli Writer's Series called "Writing a Nation: Israel at 50." There we heard for ourselves the diverse and extraordinary novelists, poets and essayists who make up your cultural fabric – a Druze poet, an ultra-orthodox woman who writes intimate fiction under a pseudonym, a Sephardic novelist originally from Iraq, an outspoken Arab poet and editor. And what unites them is that they are all part of today's Israel.

If you were to stay with us in Canada for just a while, Mr. President, you would see a similar type of diversity of people who are creating our literature and our art and our music. They are writing in either English or French, although their mother tongue may not be either.

It's only when they go outside Canada that people ask them why they are Canadian, when the obvious fact is that they have chosen to be Canadian.

The key role of the literature of immigrants in a diverse society is to make voices heard that are "ex-centric" – off the centre – and therefore to give greater voice to everyone. I think this gives Canada its strength, and I'm sure it gives Israel its strength, too. It is an essential part of the process of accommodation and understanding that marks a stable and successful multicultural society.

Canada is still in evolution, even though we are an old country, nearly 400 years in the making. I like to remind people of this, especially those in Europe who say, "You're such a young country." We are a country that, as the Ottawa writer, Daniel Poliquin, says, preceded the Third Republic in France and Garibaldi's Italy.

I know that you have also been a country which has absorbed [immigrants] and changed culturally, depending on the kind of waves of immigration that you have received. For the last 30 years, a large Sephardic constituency came to add itself to the older Ashkenazim group and brought to Israeli society different influences and experiences based on their lives of Jews emigrating from Arab and Muslim countries of North Africa, the Levant and countries to the east.

What is interesting is that your language of Hebrew has become such an important and flexible language. For people who think of it as an ancient language in which ancient books were written, we realize that, from some 8,000 words in biblical times, modern Hebrew vocabulary has now expanded to more than 120,000 words.

Your outstanding author, Amos Oz, considers the revival of the Hebrew language as one of Israel's grandest achievements, along with the creation of the kibbutz. And he says: "Modern Hebrew is like Elizabethan English. It's a marvellous instrument. I've even been able to invent new words where none existed before by joining certain words."

This idea of the flexibility of language should indicate also a suppleness in cultural acceptance and understanding. Certainly, the burst of creativity in the creation of a language is quite remarkable, and you are to be heartily congratulated for it.

The creation of Hebrew into a modern and flexible language is only one of the great achievements of civilization with which the Jewish people have been intimately bound up. In that remarkable intellectual talent of Israelis, there are achievements in science and technology, in agriculture, in making the desert a fertile place, in making it sing through the virtuosity of musical artists such as Pinchas Zukerman, musical director of our own National Arts Centre Orchestra.

However, I can't discuss Israeli contributions to civilization without talking about, as Amos Oz did, the kibbutz. Because the kibbutz is one of the great gifts of Israel to all those who believe in the instinct of humanity to co-operate. The idea of the kibbutz, the idea that there is a different way of organizing society and creating co-operation among people who aren't related, is indeed a very progressive step.

This realization of an unselfish ideal – that people can work together in as unselfish a way as possible and create together something much bigger than themselves – is one which the whole world admires, even if it does not always want to emulate it. And it has inspired young people of all nationalities around the world. Many of our young people, non-Jewish as well as Jewish, have gone to Israel to experience life on the kibbutz.

Our Canadian ties with Israel run even deeper than that. They are found in economic and commercial affairs, in culture, in social and familial relationships. Ties that arise from the private philanthropy of Canadians – the Birthright Israel Foundation, co-founded by Charles Bronfman; the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem; the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship in Jerusalem.

I mention only these ties out of the many, but they symbolize the fact that, for Jews here in Canada, Israel is an important pole star. And for non-Jewish Canadians, too. It has to do, as we all know, with the Holocaust and the dreadful events of 60 years ago, the terrible suffering inflicted on the Jewish people that will last forever in our collective memory and that can never be denied.

It is this empathy which makes us all wish that there can be lasting peace in the Middle East. We are now in the first week of March. As always, the approach of Easter for Christians and the approach of Passover for the Jews are intertwined in our shared hope for rebirth. It is no accident that spring finds Passover and Easter together. This is an ancient understanding of what spring means – hope, new vitality, the life returning to a dormant winter land. It is a fundamental part of both religious traditions.

Today, in a disturbing time of escalating violence in the region, new initiatives have been mooted. I hope you will, for the sake of your people and for the peace of the world, examine them closely with "creative thinking" and attempt to do something with them which can help all to live in peace.

It was a Spanish Jew, born in Granada 950 years ago, who wrote treatises in Arabic and poetry in Hebrew, weaving together Jewish religious and Arabic secular elements. He, too, was a refugee, and his name was Moses Ibn Ezra. His Wine Song for Spring is particularly apt for us at this time: "The hills have put on turbans of flowers, and the plain has robed itself in tunics of grass and herbs; it greets our nostrils with the incense hidden in its bosom all winter long."

And that hidden incense of peace is what we hope will be released and breathed by all in the Middle East. Desmond Tutu, the Nobel Peace Prize winner, who lived through the darkest days of apartheid in South Africa, was asked at a particularly difficult time how he could be so optimistic. He replied: "But you see, I am not optimistic. I am hopeful." And that is what we must all be – hopeful.

Mr. President, I would like to propose a toast to hope and to the warm friendship that Israel and Canada share. And to all the newly arrived people, the refugees, the immigrants, in our respective societies: that they may have the opportunities that you and I have enjoyed and have brought to fruition. To Canada and Israel.

Jewish humour: Some post-Purim thoughts

Just as the festival of Purim loomed on the horizon, my mail brought me the copy of a lecture on humour given last November at the Leo Baeck Institute in New York by Harvard University's renowned Prof. Ruth R. Wisse as the 2001 Leo Baeck Memorial Lecture. Its title was Some Serious Thoughts About Jewish Humour.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In her talk, Wisse notes that Jewish jokes frequently make fun of our own condition, which is to say that they perceive Jews to be suspended between heaven and earth, reality and hope. Often our situation is such that there seems to be no way out, but somehow we will find a way of laughing at ourselves that makes almost everything bearable.

That is not to say that we do not laugh at our enemies. We do that too. It was certainly necessary during the thousands of years of exile when our very security always seemed to hang in the balance. No wonder that Purim became the great release for our anxieties.

I clearly remember the Nazi days in Berlin. I can still see the Gestapo officer sitting in the last row of our synagogue, watching what was going on and recording what the rabbi said from the pulpit. One wrong word, or even wrong tone, might be catastrophic, which made the usual serious atmosphere of a service quite a trial for those who led it.

But on Purim it was different. That was the time when we could best our persecutors. The rabbi and cantor put the reading of the Megillah up front as Jewish tradition demanded, and it was our custom – as it still is today – to twirl our graggers when the name of Haman was mentioned.

I have heard a lot of noise in North American synagogues, but none can approach what happened in those Nazi days in Berlin. For Haman became Hitler in our minds, and to make fun of this monster right in front of the Gestapo gave us satisfaction that we could get nowhere else. It was the ultimate exercise in making a joke of our enemy, especially because our situation was so desperate.

Wisse's lecture is thoughtful, as one would expect of her, and she includes examples of jokes that illustrate the variety of Jewish humour.

If you are interested in obtaining the lecture in pamphlet form, which is only 18 pages long, you might want to ask the Leo Baeck Institute how to go about obtaining it. Call (212) 744-6400 or e-mail dthorne@lbi.cjh.org. It is worth the effort.

Where are the nice, single, Jewish men?

With all the weighty issues we have had to face recently, and with winter around us for too long, I believe we can allow ourselves a few lighthearted moments.

I decided to spend my much-needed university reading week back home in Toronto. I have theorized that Torontonians my age can go two ways when it comes to their feelings about their home town. There are those who travel far and wide but always have that stereotypical Torontonian blood in them. These are the people who will get back from university on a Thursday afternoon and will not hesitate for so much as a minute to make plans to go out that very night to the local hotspot. Then there are others (like me) who come home to see my waiting family and some of my friends, but really do not have the endurance for the frenetic pace of Toronto.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

But I do enjoy visiting T.O. – to an extent. I love to see the family dog. Also, it is refreshing to go shopping and bump into no less than 10 people from my past life and drive in parking lots that are more dangerous than the Autobahn.

There are times, however, when after being away from it for a while, Toronto becomes just too much for me. It can be traumatizing to be far from my beautiful city on the coast. While away from it this time, I was promptly reminded of two things for which I am thankful.

First, I was quickly reminded of the reasons why I go to school in Halifax. While undoubtedly, every city has its mishugas, I am still glad to be on the East Coast. Halifax is a city that has everything you can possibly need (although at times, you have to look for it a little harder) but without the madness of Toronto. People are polite. They are not overly aggressive when they drive and they smile at you as you are walking down the street, for no other reason than to be nice.

During the past week, I spent time with some men in their mid-20s who provided me with some good humour and reminded me of something else: long-term relationships are good for you.

But hanging out with these members of the opposite sex also prompted a question. Where are the nice, single Jewish guys in Toronto? My brother, whom I thought was the only one, was married 1½ years ago. (Moms, you are not allowed to nominate your sons for this title, as you probably do not see their quirkiness or alternatively, you do and think it is cute.)

I sat around a table in Toronto with a bunch of Jewish guys – handsome, I might add – who inquired about some of my female friends and encouraged me to introduce them. The problem is that while some of these people (who shall remain nameless to protect the guilty and my friendships with them) claim they want to find nice girls, they are not living by that message. They spend their nights at the current places-to-be, looking for girls who sneak in with IDs that are not quite accurate. Although my heart has told me to be more understanding, I have run out of patience. Honestly, what do these guys really expect? They say that they want to meet nice girls, but frankly, guys, actions speak louder than words.

Yes, I know in my head that these males exist everywhere; they are not native to Toronto. However, while in Halifax, I do not see this side of them, because the spirit of the city, to me, is different.

I have a great group of single, Jewish female friends at Dalhousie who are beautiful, educated, intelligent, funny and down-to-earth. Many of them are hoping that once back in Toronto, they will find their "dream men." I am worried. If you are a nice, single Jewish male in Toronto, or at least think that you are, we want to meet you. We know that you're out there somewhere, and we're willing to pay a high reward to see one in the flesh.

A new chapter awaits

With March already halfway through, the end of the school year is in sight. Though Camp Massad has been my summer home, yesterday I finally realized that I wasn't going back.

There comes a year for every camper when the phrase "time to move on" comes to life. This is the summer where I officially move into alumni status, a term I have been dreading for years.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

This year marks Camp Massad's 50th anniversary, which was commemorated on Saturday, March 2, with a gala dinner that attracted about 200 alumni, including David Gale, host of WTN's Loving Spoonfuls, and Lesley Corne, a singer and actress, who hosted the event.

Gale, who attended Massad and was part of the administration, poked fun at our camp and reminisced about his days there. While I have no doubt that this event was nostalgic for everyone there, I, too, was feeling this nostalgia even though I have only been away from camp for six months now.

I saw the glimmer of youth in all 200 people that night. It was a moment when everyone was 18 again, and it was the first time I felt a part of that company, thinking back to just a few months ago when all that mattered was Camp Massad.

But there comes a time when you have to move on, and it made sense that the time for this would be this summer. I am moving to Toronto next year and I also have plans for a possible trip to Europe. One cannot go to camp forever, but I am already appreciating everything that camp has meant to me and how it affects everyone who attends the little Lake Winnipeg paradise.

You can sense the self-pity, but that is not the point of this article. The awareness of the end of my camp era is just a part of a larger picture, which is the realization that a new chapter in my life is going to be taking place. It is anxiety coupled with excitement sprinkled with some sadness and understanding that whatever I have done in my previous 22 years, I can never get back.

I guess it all points to growing up, and in a few months I will be out on my own and joining the "real world." When all of you made that big leap from your parent's home to another city, did you feel like this? Was this impending change as conscious to you as it is to me right now?

I was going to save all this talk until the end of the year, but with the camp dinner bringing back memories of innocence and visions of real adulthood, in conjunction with the foreseeable end of the school year, now seemed the right time to relay all these thoughts.

While there may be nervousness coming through in this article, the anticipation of starting a new chapter in my life has an overwhelming excitement to it. While paying rent will be an arduous task, I am looking forward to being self-sufficient (well, somewhat!), and I am excited about becoming Jewishly independent. Right now, I go to synagogue more because my family wants to go than because I want to go, and there are other things that I do or don't do because of my family. While living at home doesn't stop me from doing what I want Jewishly, it will be much different when I don't have my parents saying that we should go to synagogue today.

I am ready to find out what it means to be Jewish for myself, and being on my own will help me explore this religion and eventually develop something I will be comfortable with (that could mean being Orthodox or something else, but at least I will come to that conclusion).

These last few months in Winnipeg will be interesting and exciting ones, but it will difficult to leave camp, my home and my childhood behind.

The Kirshner File

Arab-Israeli normalization is a dead letter

Normalization, that buzz word inextricably associated with two watershed achievements of Mideast diplomacy – the 1991 Madrid conference and the 1993 Oslo peace process – is as dead as the dodo. The high hopes created by the prospect of Israel and its Arab neighbours resolving their bitter differences through peaceful means have been crushed, for now at least, by the pincers of Arab hostility to Israel and the current Palestinian uprising.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Facilitated through the medium of a multilateral negotiating track, normalization was designed as a framework for integrating Israel into the Middle East and as a forum for airing mutually relevant issues.

The first multilateral talks took place in Moscow in 1992. The participants – Israel, 11 Arab countries, the Palestinian Authority, the United States, Russia, the European Union, Canada, Japan, China and Turkey – were organized into five working groups, covering regional and economic development, arms control and regional security, refugees, water resources and the environment.

Boycotted by Syria and Lebanon, the multilaterals enjoyed a brief existence, fading out in May 1996 after only seven sessions. Though given a fleeting respite in January 2000, the multilateral track sunk under the weight of Arab resistance to normalization. The outbreak of the second intifadah in September 2000 doomed it.

Outraged by Israel's use of force and reacting to a wave of anti-Israel revulsion not seen in Arab capitals in decades, Arab states froze bilateral relations with Israel.

It was an incremental process. On Oct. 22, 2000, less than a month after the eruption of the Palestinian rebellion, the 22 member states of the Arab League condemned Israeli "atrocities," and decided to freeze all but political contacts with Israel. The Arabs said contacts would not be resumed until Israel made tangible progress toward a final settlement with the Palestinians.

On May 20, 2001, shortly after Israel deployed F-16 fighter jets in the West Bank for the first time since the Six Day War, Arab League foreign ministers ratcheted up the pressure. They recommended severing political links with Israel until it ceased all military operations.

On May 27, the Organization of the Islamic Conference passed a resolution cutting all political ties with Israel. When Arab foreign ministers met again on Aug. 22, they urged Arab nations to refrain from opening new contacts with Israel and to boycott Israeli goods produced in Jewish settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

On Dec. 21, Arab League foreign ministers convened yet again, calling for a boycott of Ariel Sharon, Israel's new prime minister.

Prior to these deliberations, several Arab states – Morocco, Tunisia, Oman and Qatar – suspended low-level relations with Israel.

Last August, the Arabs tightened the screws when Ahmed Khazaa, commissioner-general of the Damascus-based Central Office for the Boycott of Israel, suggested that a renewal of the blacklist might force Israel to implement United Nations resolutions, particularly one calling for an Israeli pullout from the territories. Khazaa followed this up with an announcement that his agency would boycott several American, European and Asian companies doing business with Israel.

Shortly afterward, Saudi Arabia placed a German company on the boycott list after it supplied the Saudis with wheat fibre from Israel. Two months ago, Syria blacklisted two Greek ships on suspicion of visiting Israel in violation of boycott regulations.

Prior to these developments, Israel's exports to Arab countries had been on the upswing. In August 2000, a month before the intifadah broke out, the Manufacturers Association in Israel reported that exports had increased by 37 percent in the first half of the year, rising to $62 million (US).

The degree to which the Arab world has abandoned normalization since the intifadah is clearly evident in Egypt and Jordan – the only Arab states, apart from Mauritania, with embassies in Israel.

Egypt, which in 1979 was the first Arab country to establish diplomatic relations with Israel, recalled its ambassador from Tel Aviv in November 2000. Mohammed Bassiouny has yet to be replaced. (Egypt pulled its ambassador out of Israel during the 1982 Lebanon War, and a new envoy did not return until 1986.)

In recent months, Egyptian officials from President Hosni Mubarak on down have escalated their anti-Israel rhetoric, in the spirit of Egypt's cold peace with Israel. But they have resisted calls from Arab nationalists and Islamic fundamentalists to cut relations altogether.

Mubarak, however, has blasted Sharon, saying he neither trusts nor can work with him. In one bitter diatribe last July, he described Sharon, whom he has refused to meet, as a man "who knows only murder, aggression and war."

Egypt's foreign minister, Ahmed Maher, who visited Jerusalem in January in a vain effort to arrange a ceasefire between Israel and the Palestinians, has been just as verbally abusive. Rapping Israel for its policy of killing Palestinian militants, Maher referred to Sharon's government as a "gang of assassins."

In the face of these onslaughts, Israel has not remained silent. It has accused Egypt of encouraging Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to reject former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's terms for an end-of-conflict settlement. In addition, Israel claims that Egypt torpedoed a compromise resolution that would have enabled Israel and the United States to remain at last summer's UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa.

The ongoing intifadah has also affected commercial relations. Egypt cancelled plans to ship gas to Israel through a proposed new pipeline and arrested an Egyptian businessman who wanted to build a resort in the Sinai in partnership with Israeli entrepreneurs.

Hosni Mubarak

In a separate development that also augured badly for normalization, Egypt succumbed to pressure from the Federation of Egyptian Chambers of Commerce and cancelled a Euro-Mediterranean economic conference in Cairo to which Israel had been invited.

Such is the poisonous atmosphere in Cairo today that J. Sainsbury, a British firm, dropped plans to expand its supermarket chain in Egypt. This happened after its shops were subjected to a consumers boycott in the mistaken belief that J. Sainsbury is Jewish-owned.

Meanwhile, Egypt's state-controlled press escalated its anti-Israel and anti-Semitic rhetoric. Two examples will suffice. Last April, a doctored photograph of Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres in an SS uniform appeared on the front page of the opposition newspaper Al-Arabi. Then Al Akhbar published a column in which an Egyptian writer claimed that Nazi Germany's persecution of Jews "was not enough."

Tensions have eased of late. Israeli Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer met with Mubarak in Cairo and Egyptian television carried an interview with the president of Israel, Moshe Katsav.

Otherwise, the picture is grim.

Jordan, which signed a peace treaty with Israel in 1994, has been affected by the anti-normalization trend as well. Although Jordan has appointed a new ambassador to Israel, he has yet to be sent to Tel Aviv.

Normalization in Jordan, such as it was, probably reached its peak at the October 1995 Mideast economic conference in Amman. King Abdullah II, King Hussein's successor, is a proponent of cordial relations with Israel, but he is constrained by demographics: two-thirds of Jordan's population consists of Palestinian refugees, who are extremely antagonistic to Israel.

The anti-normalization movement was gaining momentum in Jordan long before the intifadah erupted. Its growing popularity prompted the prime minister to describe it as inimical to Jordan's interests.

Yet, on the eve of Israel's general election last year, Jordan's foreign minister declared that he would be unable to defend relations with Israel if Sharon swept into office. As a result of this gaffe, Jordan's relationship with Israel has cooled.

Nonetheless, King Abdullah II wants to serve as an intermediary betweeen Israel and the Palestinians. Recently, he called on Arab League members to recognize Israel, and normalize relations, in exchange for an Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines and Israel's recognition of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza.

Crown Prince Abdullah bin Abdul Aziz al-Saud of Saudi Arabia floated a similar idea in The New York Times last month. It remains to be seen whether he will raise that proposal at an Arab League conference in Beirut at the end of March.

Since a full withdrawal is unacceptable to Israel's current government, normalization is likely to remain a dead letter for the unforeseeable future.

PASSOVER IN MOROCCO

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

For old movie buffs, the phrase "Take me to the kasbah" evokes images of Humphrey Bogart, dank, foggy alleys and foreign intrigue. But when Kitty Morse takes you to the kasbah, it's bustling souks (markets), lush oases and the scent of orange blossoms.

For 15 years the Casablanca-born author of nine cookbooks has been leading sell-out tours of Morocco, visiting ancient ruins, historic cities, quaint ports and picturesque resorts, sampling the exotic tastes of her native cuisine, and offering culinary demonstrations at her family home, a restored pasha's residence.

If a trip to Morocco is not in your budget this year, take a virtual tour with Morse's latest cookbook, The Scent of Orange Blossoms (Ten Speed Press), which she co-authored with her friend, Fez native Danielle Mamane.

The pair met when Morse's tour group was staying at the Palais Jamai Hotel in Fez that houses Mamane's boutique.

"We started to chat and realized that one of my best friends in Casablanca in high school was one of her roommates in Paris," Morse recalls.

Mamane invited Morse to her home for dinner, and a friendship was forged as the dishes of Mamane's Sephardi kitchen reconnected Morse with the Jewish culinary traditions of her mother's family.

"I got to thinking, this cuisine has historical value, cultural value," says Morse. "It's a precious treasure."

The book is filled with nostalgic references to the Moroccan Jewish community's glorious past, with treasured family photos from both authors, and precious letters from Mamane to her daughters, written by her originally in French and translated by Morse, evoking cherished traditions of Shabbat and holidays past, as well as life in the mellah or Jewish district.

For Moroccan Jews, as for Jews everywhere, Passover is one of the most important holidays of the year.

Morse recreates her great-grandmother's Passover Fava Bean Soup, a Sephardi family staple, combining potatoes, turnips and onions with the fava beans and packed with cilantro. It is served with what Morse calls "the colourful armada of cooked or raw salads of Passover," such as Danielle's Roasted Bell Peppers below.

A custom unique to the Jews of Morocco is the feast of La Mimouna, held on the last evening of Passover, when Muslim families bring a lump of starter dough to their Jewish friends, marking the end of the leaven-free week of Passover.

Morse calls Currant Preserves (Mrouziya) "one of the gastronomic highlights" of the feast.

PASSOVER FAVA BEAN SOUP

For Sephardim, permitted to eat fava beans, this dish is a staple. Frozen baby lima beans can be substituted for the favas, if you prefer.

4 lbs. fresh beans, peeled and shelled
1 potato, peeled and quartered
1 turnip, peeled and quartered
1 onion, quartered
6 cups beef stock
1½ cups loosely packed cilantro leaves, plus additional for garnish
2 tsp. salt
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper

In a large saucepan, combine the fava beans, potato, turnips, onion, and 2 cups of the stock. Bring to a low boil over medium heat. Cover and cook until the turnips are tender, 25 to 30 minutes. Allow to cool.

In a blender or food processor, purée the cooked vegetables and their cooking liquid in batches with the remaining 4 cups stock and the 1½ cups cilantro until smooth. Return the mixture to the saucepan. Season with the salt and pepper and heat through. Ladle the soup into individual bowls, garnish with the cilantro leaves, and serve hot. Serves 4.

DANIELLE'S ROASTED BELL PEPPERS

Danielle's daughters always request a pound or two of their mother's twice-cooked peppers whenever she visits them in Paris. Use them as a relish or as a filling for sandwiches.

5 red bell peppers (about 2 lbs.)
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
4 cloves garlic, thinly sliced
½ tsp. salt

Preheat the broiler and line a baking sheet with aluminum foil. Cut the peppers along the grooves into 5 or 6 lobes. Place, skin side up, on the prepared baking sheet. Broil until the skins blister evenly, 8 to 10 minutes. Transfer to a bowl and cover tightly with plastic wrap. When cool, peel and seed the peppers.

In a large skillet, heat the olive oil over medium heat. Add the garlic and cook, stirring occasionally, until it turns golden, 3 to 4 minutes. Add the peppers and fry for 3 to 4 minutes on each side. Transfer to a colander to drain.

Arrange the peppers on a serving dish as if they were petals of a flower. Sprinkle with the salt and the fried garlic. Serve at room temperature. The peppers will keep for up to a week in an airtight container in the refrigerator. Bring to room temperature before serving. Serves 4.

CURRANT PRESERVES

1 lb. dried black currants, rinsed quickly under running water
1¼ cups sugar
⅓ cup water, or more juice of ½ lemon
½ tsp. ground cloves
15 walnut halves

In a large, nonreactive saucepan, combine the currants, sugar, and ⅓ cup water over medium heat. Cook, stirring occasionally, until the mixture begins to bubble gently, 8 to 10 minutes. Add the lemon juice and cloves. Decrease the heat to low and cook, stirring occasionally, until most of the water has evaporated. Add water, a tablespoon at a time, if the mixture becomes too dry. It should thicken and turn the colour of dark caramel. This process may take 30 to 40 minutes.

Reserve 5 or 6 walnut halves for garnish. Combine the remaining nuts with the currant mixture and remove from the heat. Allow to cool and store in a tightly sealed container in the refrigerator.

Reheat the mrouziya over low heat for 20 to 30 minutes. Pour the warm preserve into a festive compotier, and garnish with the reserved walnut halves. Serve in individual saucers and savour with a small spoon. Serves 12.

Norene Gilletz's Passover food tour

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Passover is just around the corner, bringing with it the annual challenge of what to prepare for the seders and everyday Passover meals. The decision of what to serve each year is always a dilemma.

I have several friends who are extremely organized. They keep copies of their menus in a special Passover file so they have a record of the dishes that their family and friends enjoy, along with comments such as, "Uncle Jack loves my sweet and sour meatballs, but cousin Sarah has decided to become a vegetarian!"

For a change, I thought it would be fun to have an imaginary progressive Passover dinner tour. We will visit the kitchens of three Jewish cookbook authors who are my personal friends and finish the tour in my kitchen. Even though we live (and cook) in different cities, we are all connected via our common culinary cord. Here is a sampling of some of our tried-and-true recipes for you to enjoy. So hop on board the magical matzah for a delicious culinary tour!

First stop is Philadelphia, Pa., at the home of Ethel Hofman. She is a cookbook author extraordinaire, syndicated columnist and kosher food consultant. Ethel has been my mentor and friend for nearly 20 years. We've shared many wonderful meals, food stories and culinary bits of wisdom over the years. She has been a special source of inspiration and encouragement.

Ethel grew up in the only Jewish family living on the Shetland Islands, north of Scotland. In that remote corner of the world, she learned first-hand from her late mother how to work with local ingredients to prepare traditional Jewish dishes, yet still follow kosher guidelines.

Ethel recommends that if you have family members who don't eat red meat, this turkey recipe is a fine choice for a gala main course. Vegetable oil can be substituted for the chicken fat to keep cholesterol levels down. This simple, delectable dish is just one of the 350 recipes from Ethel's excellent cookbook, Everyday Cooking for the Jewish Home.

ETHEL'S PESACH-STUFFED TURKEY BREAST

½ cup crumbled matzah
2 tbsp. schmaltz or vegetable oil
1 medium onion, chopped
1 Granny Smith apple, chopped
1 large green bell pepper, cut into ¼-in. dice
2 tbsp. chopped fresh cilantro or parsley
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
2½ lb. boneless turkey breast
2 tbsp. oil
paprika

Preheat oven to 375. Cover matzah with warm water and soak for 5 minutes to soften. Drain and set aside. Heat schmaltz in a large skillet. Add onion and apple. Cook over medium heat until onion is softened and translucent, about 5 minutes. Remove from heat.

Stir matzah, bell pepper, cilantro, salt and pepper into onion and apples. Spoon stuffing into centre of turkey breast. Bring ends together and fasten with metal poultry picks. Brush turkey breast with oil and dust with paprika. Place in a roasting pan and cover with foil. Roast in preheated oven for 1 hour, basting often with pan juices.

Turkey is done when juices run clear when pierced at thickest part with a fork. Let stand 5 minutes. Slice and serve hot. Makes 8 servings.

Second stop is Potomac, Md., at the home of Sheilah Kaufman. Sheilah has authored 22 cookbooks and will have two new books out this year. She proudly says that "fearless, fussless, easy, elegant" cooking is her trademark. (This is also the name of one of her more popular books.) Sheilah says her recipes must be able to be made ahead of time and frozen, with a short preparation time, and they must taste fabulous. She loves to share her recipes and love of cooking with friends and family. When she visited me a few years ago, she completely took over my kitchen and cheerfully prepared some of her scrumptious specialties for us. You can be sure that she will always be a welcome guest in my home.

When I told her that I was writing this special Passover article, Sheilah said "Of course I'll send you a recipe!" So enjoy this easy dish from Sheilah's newest cookbook, Sephardic/Israeli Cuisine, which is due out in April.

Sheilah writes "Leeks are one of the oldest known vegetables and are much loved by Middle Eastern people. This wonderful dish from Isabella Sciaky is served for Passover and Rosh Hashanah and can be adapted as a dish for Chanukah by leaving out the meat. Enjoy."

(KEFTIKAS DE PRASSA, KEFTIKAS DE PUERO)

8 very thick leeks, whites only with a little green, roots removed ½ lb. ground beef, ground twice
3 large eggs
1 tsp. salt
freshly ground pepper
matzah meal oil for frying
lemon slices, for garnish

Slice leeks in half lengthwise and wash thoroughly to remove all the sand. Chop the leeks and place them in a saucepan with enough cold water to cover. Bring to a boil, cover, and cook the leeks until they are tender, about 4 to 5 minutes.

Drain the leeks and let them cool. Squeeze out as much water as possible, but leave just a little water so the keftikas will not be too dry. Place leeks in a meat grinder or food processor and grind them (twice through a meat grinder). (Do not put the leeks in the refrigerator until you have ground them since it will be impossible to grind them after refrigerating.)

Combine the leeks, meat, eggs, salt, and pepper to taste and add enough matzah meal to form into patties (keftes). They should be about walnut size, then flatten them with your hands.

In a large skillet or fry pan, heat the oil (enough to at least cover the bottom of the pan) and fry until they are brown on each side. Drain well on paper towels. Serve with slices of lemon. Makes 8 to 10 servings as a side dish.

Variation: Venoutcha Benaroyo from Bulgaria made these for Passover for the lunch following the seder night. In Ladino, they are called albondigas de prasa. In her version, she uses a pound of ground meat with the leeks and seasoning (no other ingredients). The patties are then dipped in eggs and matzah meal and fried.

Third stop is Fullerton, Calif., at the home of Judy Kancigor. Judy is a cookbook author, columnist and cooking teacher. The colourful dish Matzah Schalat, a delicious kugel-type pudding, comes from her nostalgic cookbook Melting Pot Memories. If you are interested in genealogy, you'll love the stories, humour and recipes found in this wonderful book.

Judy writes: "Last year, when the Food Editor of the Los Angeles Daily News came to photograph this recipe, she suggested putting the mixture in a springform pan. The results were dramatic! Triple this recipe if you are using a 9- or 10-inch springform pan or a 9 x 13-inch baking dish. If you only have a 9-inch springform pan, you will have some left over to bake in a separate dish for a delicious preview!"

JUDY'S MATZAH SCHALAT

3 individual matzot
3 eggs, separated
½ cup sugar
2 tbsp. margarine, melted
rind of ¼ of a lemon, grated
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. vanilla
¼ cup white raisins (or dried apricots, slivered)
2 medium apples, sliced thin fruit for garnish (pineapple, strawberries, blueberries, mandarin oranges) margarine and cinnamon (for top)

Crumble matzah and soak in cold water until soft. Drain thoroughly. Beat egg yolks with half the sugar. Add margarine, lemon rind, cinnamon and vanilla and mix. Stir in raisins and apples. Beat egg whites, add remaining sugar slowly and beat until stiff. Fold in. Pour into well-greased baking pan. Decorate top into pretty design with canned sliced pineapple, strawberries (fresh or frozen), blueberries and mandarin oranges. Dot with margarine slivers and cinnamon. Bake at 350 for 1 hour. Can be frozen.

An elegant variation: Triple the recipe above. Lightly grease the inside of a springform pan. Pat pineapple rings dry with paper towels, then press pineapple against the sides of the pan. Place strawberry slices or canned cherries in the middle, then put blueberries and mandarin oranges in a pretty pattern around the pineapple rings. Pour the batter in slowly so as not to disturb the fruit. Bake as directed above.

The final stop on our culinary tour is Toronto, Canada, in my busy kitchen.

Here is a quick and easy recipe from my low-fat, healthy cookbook MealLeaniYumm! Not only is it among my personal favourites, I have also received many compliments for this chicken recipe from readers near and far.

It comes from my friend Gloria Schachter of Montreal, who tested and proofread many of the recipes in MealLeaniYumm! Over the years, we've enjoyed many culinary discussions (and meals) and have remained close friends even though we now live in different cities.

Gloria and I collaborated to produce this moist and luscious chicken dish, which can be multiplied easily for a crowd. I'm sure you and your guests will enjoy this – it's a winner!

Seder Sephardi style

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Sephardi Jews do not differ from Ashkenazi Jews in the basic tenets of Judaism, but there are some differences in their practices, particularly for Passover.

The differences reflect the customs of the Jews who lived in a specific area.

Ashkenazi Jews lived primarily in eastern Europe; Sephardi Jews, many of whom were descendants of Jews who lived in Spain and Portugal before the expulsion of 1492, emigrated to countries where they incorporated the practices of their Diaspora culture – India, the countries of North Africa and others.

Some of the differences in customs are seen at the seder table where, for example, lettuce rather than horseradish is used for bitter herbs. In addition, some Sephardi authorities permit rice to be eaten at Passover.

Ruby Ezekiel who came from Calcutta, India, explained that in their tradition, the items for the seder are placed on a large copper tray and covered with a silk cloth. The charoset is made with date juice, called hallek, which gives the brown colour of mortar and a sweet taste.

The Four Questions are not asked by the youngest person but are chanted in unison. Before the chanting, the leader asks the youngest member who carries the afikoman, "Whence have you come?" "From Egypt" is the reply. "Where are you going?" "To Jerusalem." "Do you have provision for the journey?" No answer is given, but the child points to the afikoman which has been placed on his or her back.

Ezekiel also told of how Sephardim usher Passover out on the evening following the conclusion of the festival with a picturesque ceremony in the home. Members of the family greet each other with the words "sant-el-khadra" Arabic for "a year of good fortune," as they lightly stroke each other with green leaves or a vegetable and offer blessings and good wishes.

Here are some Sephardi recipes from Ezekiel for Passover or all year round.

VEGETABLE PILAU (RICE)

- 1/2 cup 2-inch carrot sticks
- 1/2 cup 1/2-inch potato cubes
- 1 cup 1-inch cauliflowerets
- 1 cup shredded cabbage
- 3 tbsp. oil
- 1/2 cup sliced onion
- 1/2 tsp. crushed fresh ginger root
- 1/2 tsp. crushed garlic
- 1/2 tsp. ground turmeric
- 1 tsp. salt, or to taste
- 2 cups raw rice, well rinsed and drained
- 3 1/2 cups water
- 1/2 cup chopped ripe tomato
- 3 whole cloves
- 1 cinnamon stick, 3 inches, broken into half
- 4 cardamom pods, cracked
- 2 tbsp. raisins (optional)
- 12 almonds blanched and halved (optional)
- 1/4 cup chopped fresh coriander

Cook the carrot sticks in boiling water for 2 minutes. Remove and set aside. Cook the potato, cauliflower and cabbage separately for the same length of time. Drain each vegetable well.

Heat the oil in a pan and brown the onion until a light brown colour develops, about 3 minutes. Add the ginger root, garlic, turmeric and salt, and stir for 1 minute.

Add the rice and stir well to coat the grains with the flavourings, about 2 minutes. Add the cooked vegetables, water, tomato, cloves, cinnamon and cardamom. Bring to a boil; add the raisins and almonds, if using. Turn the heat to low, cover the pan and cook for about 15 minutes. The water should be completely absorbed and rice dry.

At this stage, sprinkle with the coriander. Stir the rice to fluff it up. Cover the pan and let the mixture rest for 10 to 15 minutes more. Serve warm. Serves 6.

AROOK (RICE BALLS)

Arook means "veined" in both Hebrew and Arabic (from Baghdad) since the ground chicken appears as "veins" running through the rice.

½ cup raw rice
2 cups water
2 tsp. salt, or to taste
½ lb. boneless chicken, chopped fine
½ tsp. ground turmeric
½ tsp. crushed fresh ginger root
½ tsp. crushed garlic
¼ tsp. garam masala
1 tbsp. chopped fresh mint, coriander or celery leaves
1 egg beaten
2 tbsp. plus 2 tsp. corn or peanut oil

Rinse the rice under cold water. Bring 2 cups water to a boil with 1 tsp. salt, add the rice and cook rapidly for 5 minutes. Drain the rice and set aside.

Mix the warm rice with the chicken, remaining salt, turmeric, ginger root, garlic, garam masala, mint, egg and 2 tsp. oil.

Moisten your hands with cold water. Scoop up 2 tbsp. of the rice mixture and shape into a ball 2 to 2½ inches in diameter. This can be done by rolling the ball in a circular motion in the palm of your hand. Shape all the rice balls. Place the rice balls in a baking pan well coated with 2 tbsp. oil. Bake at 375 for 30 to 35 minutes. Do not turn the balls; let them bake to a light brown with a firm top. Serve warm. Makes 8 balls.

Variation:

A ½ lb. of boneless fish such as flounder, cod or haddock, chopped fine, can be used instead of the chicken. With the fish, use chopped mint or parsley. With the chicken, coriander or celery are preferable.

Note: The arook can be made a day or two in advance.

Raymonde Alloul, who was born in Marrakech, Morocco, and her daughter Francine Goldrich, who was born in Casablanca, told The CJN that the Sephardi custom in their region was to not eat rice for Passover.

But there is a lot of emphasis on using lamb. One of their favourite dishes is truffes, a mushroom dish. She says it is their custom to prepare many seasonal vegetables at Passover.

Goldrich spoke of some of their rituals such as bebelo. The head of the house holds a vase of fresh flowers over the head of each member of the family as the Ha Lachma Anya is recited.

On the last night of Passover they celebrate La Mimouna – the breaking of Passover. Family members and friends visit one another and an elaborate table is filled with sweets, such as la Moflete, a traditional dish which is a flat crepe served with honey and butter.

A typical seder meal would include vegetable soup, pastelles — a potato dish, lamb with prunes and onions, and tongue with capers.

Here are Goldrich's recipes for Moroccan vegetable soup and a mouton (lamb) dish.

LAMB WITH ONIONS AND PRUNES (MOUTON AUX PRUNEAUX ET OIGNONS)

3 to 4 lb. lamb pieces
2 lb. bag onions
1 cup prunes, pitted
1 cup raisins
¼ cup oil
1 cup water
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. sugar
½ tsp. ginger (powder)
¼ tsp. nutmeg
¼ tsp. turmeric
¼ tsp. salt

Rinse lamb pieces and pat dry. Seaon with spices and sugar. In a large pot, add oil and water, alternate layers of onions, seasoned meat, raisins and prunes. Cover and bring to a boil, then cook on low heat for 2½ hours.

Kashruth Council recipes for Passover

The Kosher Information Service of the Kashruth Council of Canada, affiliated with the Vaad Harabanim of Toronto and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, publishes a COR holiday information and recipe pamphlet for each major holiday.

The following are recipes from the Passover 2002-5762 pamphlet.

If you wish to be placed on the COR mailing list to receive information throughout the year, call the Kashruth Council 416-635-9550, fax 416-635-8760 or write to 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Toronto, M2R 3V2. There is no charge.

PUREE OF PARSNIP AND CARROT SOUP

3 tbsp. oil
2 onions, chopped
3 parsnips, peeled and chopped
3 carrots, peeled and chopped
6 cups pareve chicken stock or 3 cans condensed clear chicken soup with 3 cans water
½ cup chopped flat leaf parsley
1 tbsp. dried basil
salt and pepper to taste

Heat oil in a large saucepan; sauté onions for 5 minutes; add the parsnips, carrots, liquid, parsley and basil. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat, cover and simmer for 20-25 minutes or until parsnips and carrots are soft. Add salt and pepper to taste and puree in blender or food processor until smooth. Heat and serve with toasted matzah farfel (see recipe below). Serves 6-8.

Variation: Garnish with lemon slices.

TOASTED MATZAH FARFEL

2 cups matzah farfel
2 egg yolks, beaten
½ tsp. salt

Preheat oven to 350. Combine ingredients. Spread out on foil lined cookie sheet and bake until golden, about 20-25 minutes. Serve with your favourite soup or salad. Yield 2 cups.

FRUIT STUFFED CHICKEN BREASTS

6 chicken breasts, at least 1½ inches thick. Cut a pocket in each breast without cutting all the way through.
1 cup crushed toasted matzah farfel (crushed in blender or food processor to resemble crumbs)
1 small orange, sectioned and diced
1 small apple, peeled, cored and chopped
¼ cup raisins
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. nutmeg (optional)
1 cup chicken stock
½ cup dry white wine

Toss all ingredients together except for the chicken, stock and wine. Cover and let stand for 1 hour. Stir before stuffing the breasts. Spoon some of the stuffing into each breast and skewer together.

Preheat oven to 350. Place chicken breasts in a shallow roasting pan. Pour chicken stock and wine over the chicken breasts. Cover and bake for 20 minutes. Uncover and bake until chicken is brown. Serves 6.

Note: Leftover stuffing: Place in lightly greased baking pan or lightly greased muffin tins and bake for 15 minutes.

MASHED SWEET POTATO PUFF

*6 medium sweet potatoes
1 tsp. salt

Cook potatoes in their skins in boiling salted water until tender. Drain.

In the meantime, prepare filling:
2 tbsp. oil
½ lb. mushrooms, sliced
½ cup celery, chopped
½ cup red or green pepper, diced
1 garlic clove, minced (optional)
½ cup chicken stock, hot
2 eggs, beaten
¼ tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. margarine
garnish: chopped fried onions.

Heat oil, add vegetables: sauté for 10 minutes, set aside.

Preheat oven to 350. Peel and mash potatoes with potato masher or mixmaster on the lowest speed. Gradually add chicken stock as needed and continue beating until light and fluffy; add eggs, pepper and margarine. Lightly grease an 8x8-inch baking pan or pie plate. Place ½ of the potato mixture in the pan. Fill centre with the vegetable mixture; cover with remaining potato mixture. Sprinkle top with chopped fried onions. Bake for ½ hour. Serves 6-8.

*Note: Yukon Gold potatoes are good if you don't like sweet potatoes.

SPONGE CAKE FRUIT TRIFLE

Prepare 2 days in advance of serving.

1 sponge cake or macaroons liqueur or orange juice jam
fresh or canned fruit, drained custard (see recipe)
toasted slivered almonds (optional)

Custard:
2 cups water
1 cup sugar
¼ tsp. salt
5 tbsp. potato starch
3 egg yolks, beaten
5 tbsp. lemon or orange juice

Place water, sugar, salt and potato starch in saucepan. Blend well, stirring constantly over low heat until mixture boils. Slowly add beaten egg yolks and continue to cook 2 minutes more. Remove from heat and add juice. Mix well, cool.

Layer ½ the cake slices in the bottom of a large attractive glass bowl or trifle bowl. Sprinkle with liqueur or orange juice. Spread a layer of jam, fresh fruit, ½ of the custard and almonds. Repeat layer. Refrigerate for at least 24 hours to allow flavours to blend. Serves 10-12.

Note: If not using almonds, garnish with your favourite fruit before serving.

COCONUT MACAROONS

5 egg whites
½ tsp. salt
juice and rind of 2 lemons
1½ cups sugar
1 cup matzah meal
2 cups shredded coconut

Beat egg whites with salt and juice and rind of lemon until soft peaks form. Gradually add sugar, beat until stiff and of meringue consistency. Fold in matzah meal and coconut.

Preheat oven to 325. Line a cookie sheet with foil (shiny side up). Brush lightly with oil and dust with matzah meal. Drop by teaspoonful 1 inch apart. Bake for ½ hour. Increase heat to 400 for a few moments until macaroons are brown. Yield 2-2½ dozen.

Please note: All processed ingredients and wines have to be marked "kosher for Passover."

Passover Food Ideas

Recipe ideas for Passover from The CJN staff

With their usual good nature, CJN staff members responded to our call for favourite Passover recipes:

GRANNY MEHR'S TZIMMES
(submitted by Gloria Clamen)

One of my favourite recipes for Passover this is from The Kinnereth Cookbook. Always a hit! And it lasts several days and tastes more delicious each day.

3 lb. flanken
2 sliced onions
5 lb. carrots cut into coins
5 sweet potatoes, peeled and quartered
1 cup brown sugar
1 tbsp. salt

Topping:
8 large potatoes
2 eggs
salt to taste
2 tbsp. oil

Use a pot that can cook on top of stove as well as in the oven. Cook meat and onions in large roaster, covered with water, on top of stove, for 1 hour. Add sliced carrots. Cook covered for 1 hour.

Add sweet potatoes, salt and sugar. Bake in moderate oven for another hour. This can be done in advance and refrigerated. The next day, preheat oven to 350 and reheat tzimmes while preparing potato topping.

Peel and grate potatoes. Drain. Add salt, eggs and oil. Spoon over tzimmes and bake for 1½ hours uncovered until well browned. Tzimmes improves with age. Simply add a little water each time before reheating.

VEGETABLE BAKE
(submitted by Beverley Bergman)

⅓ cup water
8 oz. broccoli, chopped
1 onion, chopped
1 large carrot, peeled and finely chopped
2 stalks celery, chopped
8 oz. tomato sauce
dash of pepper
¼ tsp. each garlic powder and parsley
½ cup matzah meal

Steam broccoli, onions, carrots and celery in water for 15 minutes. Add spices, 6 oz. of tomato sauce and matzah meal. Mix well. Press into small casserole dish. Bake at 375 for 15 minutes. Serves 6.

PAREVE PASSOVER MUSHROOM SOUP
(submitted by Louise Wolman)

3 onions, sliced in rings
1½ lbs. mixed mushrooms (e.g. button, shataki, oyster, Portobello), sliced chicken soup base (pareve)
at least 6 cups water

Sauté onions and mushrooms until brown (you can add a little wine). Add chicken soup base and water. Simmer for ½ hour, covered. Sprinkle chopped shallots before serving.

Help a nation witness miracles

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

It happened in a patient lounge of Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem. It was late evening. The lights had been dimmed, the last of the visitors had been sent home and the flickering glow of a television set was the sole movement evident in the corridor.

This was the rehab floor. Here, long-term elderly patients bonded with each other as they faced a similar fate, learning to cope after a stroke. A circle of about a dozen of them sat in silence in their wheelchairs as the television droned on.

Then the commotion began. All of a sudden, a 15-year-old boy, the only youth in a ward of seniors, struggled to stand up. "Nurse! Nurse!" came the urgent and repeated cries from the astonished onlookers. As the nurses ran to see what was happening, the excitement intensified.

"Get him a cane!" one person demanded.

"No, a walker," another shouted.

"Just help him!" someone else protested.

By now, even the nurses were screaming as well. Everyone was shouting for the boy to take a step. The entire floor came to life. Patients came out of their rooms to see and cheer; those who were immobile in their beds called out, demanding to know what was happening.

What was happening was a minor miracle. Three months ago, this boy was celebrating a friend's birthday on Ben Yehuda Street in Jerusalem when the first of two bombs went off, killing, maiming and terrorizing a nation. He had flown through the air, landed and had never since risen. Either due to neurological damage or sheer shock, his poor brain would not communicate with his arms and legs.

After three frightful months of futile physiotherapy and contemplating the rest of his life as a quadriplegic, the boy's brain and body were now, thankfully, co-operating. Family members who had just gone home were immediately called and couldn't come fast enough. Within 20 minutes, family, neighbours, school chums, doctors, nurses and therapists – simply everyone – came to see and celebrate.

While all were beyond themselves with emotion, the boy, with the help of his walker, could not be stopped, as if he couldn't believe he was actually walking. He would slowly reach the end of the hall and return again and again. His face had a look of concentration and astonishment. He was totally oblivious to the partying around him and would simply not stop.

I share this story with you because it is so difficult for us in North America to grasp the scope of individual human suffering resulting from terror. Also, because as a nation, we too, like this hapless boy, have been shocked and paralyzed by Palestinian terrorism.

But a couple of important points to consider – we will come out of this. Remember, this is far from being our first crisis. Secondly, all Jews must consider themselves personally in the crisis and ask themselves what they can do to alleviate it.

A few suggestions: Politically, you can help by debating, defending and showing staunch solidarity with both the Israeli people and the government. Familiarize yourself with the situation. Read and think. Do not accept anti-Israel propaganda from the media – fight it, protest it, write a letter or cancel a subscription. Do not despair and join the dangerous and delusional ranks of the political left.

Economically, you can help by buying Israel Bonds, buying Israeli produce and products, contributing to your Israeli charities and doing everything in your power to boost the economy. In terms of moral support, you can send condolence notes to families of bereaved civilians and soldiers. (Names and addresses can be obtained from the Internet or the Israeli Consulate.) And you can also help spiritually by praying to God, saying Tehillim, doing mitzvot and going to synagogue.

Perhaps, then, more miracles will happen.

The era of the court Jew

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

The phrase "court Jew" is sometimes facetiously used today to describe the powerful underling of a major political or business leader who acts obsequiously and with excessive discretion because he is Jewish.

If the original Hofjuden or court Jews of 17th- and 18th-century Europe were sometimes embarrassed by their Hebraic blood, it was because they entirely lacked the civil rights that we take for granted. Jews back then were excluded from many professions and guilds, and barred from many cities; in places that permitted them, it was usually under the burden of heavy taxes and expensive letters of protection.

After the Thirty Years' War, princes and regents of the German, Austrian and other territories across Europe found they could revitalize their war-depleted treasuries by striking bold alliances with select Jewish businessmen who had vast international trading networks and ready access to Jewish credit at their disposal.

The court Jews were suppliers of essential munitions and provisions to armies engaged in battle: one of the most famous of the breed, Samuel Oppenheimer – known as the Judenkaiser, or "Jewish emperor" – was instrumental in saving Vienna during the Turkish siege of 1683.

Purveyors of commercial goods, bankers, financial agents and even minters of state currency, the court Jews became involved in political affairs and court intrigues, and were sometimes sent as diplomatic couriers on secret missions.

As historian Selma Stern points out in her classic 1950 work, The Court Jew, these powerful historical figures often interceded politically as so-called shtadlanim (intercessors) to gain rights and privileges for the Jewish community. Stern calls the court Jew "the first fully recognizable personality to emerge in modern Jewish history."

Stern presents colourful profiles of such characters as Oppenheimer, his nephew Samson Wertheimer, Moses Benjamin Wulff and Jud Suess. She points out that, like the rabbinical families of Europe, many Hofjuden families intermarried and formed dynasties. For instance, Oppenheimer's son Wolf married a daughter of Leffman Behrens, court Jew of Hanover, whose cousin, Behrend Lehmann, was court Jew of Halberstadt.

A uniquely valuable source of information is the 17th-century diary of Glueckel of Hameln, whose husband Haim Hameln was a business partner to his cousin, Jost Liebmann of Hamburg. Haim's sister married Leffman Behrens, and Glueckel's sister married Mordecai Gumpel of Cleves, court Jew of Brandenburg and father of Elias Cleve Gomperz, founder of a powerful banking house.

Numerous descendants of court Jews, including the Rothschilds, became mighty financiers, and some would play pivotal roles in the rise of industrialism and the railways.

As Stern shows, many court Jews met with a tragic demise, none more spectacularly than Joseph Suess Oppenheimer of Wuertemberg, popularly known as Jud Suess. Having abandoned Judaism for decades, he returned to it at the end of his life, and it was as a Jew that he was imprisoned on trumped-up charges of high treason and hanged in 1737.

The fortunes of many court Jews were wiped out after their deaths, Stern reports. Jost Liebmann's widow, Esther, for example, made claims on the state treasury for monies it owed her husband, and was unjustly compelled to renounce these claims and forfeit another huge sum as penalty.

"The tragic fate... which befell many of the court Jews and plunged them into poverty and despair was caused not by any fault of their own, but by the chaos of the period in which they lived," Stern writes.

The Court Jew brings the era of the court Jew back to life so vividly that it has rarely been out of print. A new edition of her book was recently published by the Leo Baeck Institute of New York.

Preparing for Passover

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's known as the holiday of national liberation. But don't try to convince anyone who spends days, weeks and even months cleaning for Passover.

As you find yourself scouring, mopping and vacuuming, the important thing to remember is that you are not alone... especially if you have a computer nearby. Today, cleaning for Passover on the World Wide Web.

But first, a reminder. There are many excellent articles explaining the whys and hows of Passover cleaning, but for the final word, consult a rabbi.

If the cleaning ritual is new to you, here's a Web site with a not-so-intimidating title: "An absolutely very short guide to keeping kosher for Pesach." [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/kosher.htm] But if you are looking for more detail, check out "Clean for Pesach and enjoy the seder," edited by Rabbi Moshe Finkelstein. Before he gets into the nitty gritty, Rabbi Finkelstein explains why modern Passover causes such high levels of cleaning angst. In the past, wealthy people who lived in large homes often had many servants to do their cleaning. Poor people who could not afford servants lived in small homes with one or two rooms. "Today, we seem to be caught in a trap," he says. Our homes are larger. Furniture, utensils and clothing are more plentiful. But we don't have the servants to do the cleaning. So the weeks before the holiday are filled with cleaning [http://www.israelvisit.co.il/top/Clean.htm].

Kashrut.com runs one of the most comprehensive preparation sites for the holiday. The site contains articles explaining how to kasher utensils for Passover use and how to survive Passover eve. One article explains why some products that seem to be fresh, natural or additive-free may still need special certification for use on Passover [http://www.kashrut.com/Passover/]. Meanwhile, since customs vary between Ashkenazim and Sephardim, the kashrus.org site explains how to kasher utensils for Passover the Sephardi way [http://www.kashrus.org/kosher/pesachseph.html].

If you want to take a break from all the reading, you can listen to a Passover preparation lecture on your computer presented by Rabbi Gershon Bess of Kehilas Yaakov. Rabbi Bess covers everything from cleaning refrigerators to kashering Tupperware [http://www.613.org/passover/bess/bess.html]. You can find more Passover lectures elsewhere on the 613.org site [http://www.613.org/pasclass.html].

Sometimes cleaning can actually be dangerous. Professor Yona Amitai, a senior toxicologist at Hadassah-University Hospital in Jerusalem, warns that "the number of accidental poisonings of children from cleaning fluid triples during the two or three weeks before Passover, and poisonings from all other causes doubles, compared to the rest of the year." Amitai urges the public to be especially careful with liquid drain cleaners, and never to mix bleach with acids. He also advises parents to be extra cautious when cleaning out medicine cabinets to ensure drugs do not end up in the hands of children [http://www.hadassah.org/news/releases/031601a.htm].

As Passover approaches, we begin to keep track of which rooms are "Pesachtik" (cleaned for Passover) and which are "chametz-tik" (full of crumbs). The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism Web site has some advice for "Making the Passover changeover": 1. Store Pesachtik food, preferably out of the kitchen to avoid confusion. 2. Clean the kitchen cupboards. 3. Kasher your fridge and freezer. 4. Kasher the stove and oven. Follow the directions until you get to number 14 and start cooking!! [http://uscj.npil.com/generic415.html]

In "The Joys (?) of Passover cleaning," Emuna Braverman utters some very controversial words: "I'm beginning to feel like an endangered species, because I like Passover. It's actually my favorite holiday." [http://www.aish.com/family/heart/The_Joys_($)_of_Passover_Cleaning.asp] This fact dawned on her after she attended one of those Passover getaways where everything but everything is done for you. "And I learned an important lesson. Studying the ideas underlying Passover was not the true preparation... It was the physical effort that led to the emotional and intellectual preparation. I felt less prepared when I didn't take out my special dishes, when I didn't clean my children's bedrooms... And I felt more alone... So, much as I would like a vacation... I can't wait to start cleaning."

Next week, the cleaning continues.

A rich selection of quotations

Pathways to Spirituality*, by Sidney Greenberg, 1st Books Library, 2001.

The Wisdom of Modern Rabbis*, by Sidney Greenberg, Citadel Press, 2001.

Who was it that said: "Stronger than an army is a quotation whose time has come?" The Book of Proverbs teaches that "a word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in settings of silver." Benjamin Disraeli was sure that "the wisdom of the wise and the experience of the ages are perpetuated by quotations."

Sidney Greenberg is a retired Conservative rabbi who has long been admired for the more than 30 books he has written and edited. These include volumes of sermons, replete with original ideas felicitously expressed and a variety of splendid anthologies.

Pathways to Spirituality is divided into 57 chapters that offer quotations from a rich harvest of Jewish and non-Jewish sources. Most of the selections in both volumes are succinct, ranging from ancient to modern times and tending to enkindle the emotions and stimulate the mind.

The following quotations, culled from both books, attest to the wisdom to be found in apt and sage utterances.

"Should the earth be submerged under another Great Flood, the Jewish people would learn to live underwater." – Benjamin Kahn

"Among all my patients in the second half of life – that is to say, over 35 – there has not been one whose problem in the last resort was not that of finding a religious outlook on life. It is safe to say that every one of them fell ill because he had lost that which the living religions of every age have given to their followers, and none of them has been really healed who did not regain his religious outlook." – Carl Jung

"In all languages of the world, the word 'life' is a singular noun in all languages except Hebrew. In the sacred tongue of our Bible and prophets, life is chai-im. It is a plural form and there is no singular for it in the holy tongue. Why? Because a good life cannot possibly be lived in the singular. It must be in the plural." – Joseph Lookstein

"You cannot kill time without injuring eternity." – Henry David Thoreau

"Happiness is a perfume you cannot pour on others without getting a few drops on yourself." – Ralph Waldo Emerson

"Only God can give us credit for the words we do not speak." – Harold Kushner

"The worst punishment one can mete out is to take away someone's faith." – the Baal Shem Tov

"The doctor confronting his patient is having his dedication tested. The lawyer consulting with his client is having his integrity tested. The preacher preparing his sermon is having his honesty tested. The teacher preparing her lesson is having her devotion tested. The businessman on the telephone, the carpenter building a shed, the mechanic under the car, the painter on the scaffold – each is having his character tested. To look upon life as a series of tests means to bring to it at every time the finest of which we are capable." – Sidney Greenberg

Concordia electoral officer promises clean election

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Concordia Student Union's new chief electoral officer (CEO) has vowed to keep this month's general elections above-board and to restore students' confidence in the process they use to choose their government.

Stephan Herman, who gained experience in running an election by helping Robert Libman in his bid for a Montreal council seat, told a press conference the upcoming election for representatives to Concordia's undergraduate student government will be "the most open, level and transparent" in the school's history.

He said he also hopes to increase voter turnout, which traditionally has been less than 10 per cent.

"Over the last year, the faith of the student body in the electoral process and office of the CEO has suffered numerous blows... We'll do what we can to make it easy and fair for candidates to run and for students to vote," he said.

The voting will take place March 26, 27 and 28, and all undergraduates are eligible to cast ballots. The nomination period was March 4 to March 11.

All elected Concordia Student Union (CSU) seats are open, including the executive, composed of the president and from three to nine vice-presidents, and the 30-member council of representatives.

Students last went to the polls at the end of November, after 3,200 signatures were collected on a petition demanding a byelection for a new CSU executive. The signatories wanted to replace the far-left, pro-Palestinian faction that has dominated the CSU over the past two years.

A moderate slate, headed by Chris Schulz, took the most votes, even though Schulz was briefly disqualified by the former CEO. Schulz never took office because of a CSU judicial board ruling that the results were invalid due to "irregularities" during the election that disenfranchised 300 students.

Since then, the CSU has had an interim executive that the university administration has refused to recognize. The administration has also withheld the CSU's student dues and said it will collect the funds and hold them in trust until the CSU has a "duly elected" executive.

The CEO during the November byelection, Jessica Lajambe, was found by the judicial board to have been incompetent and was dismissed, partly because she was thought to have been biased against Schulz's slate. She was associated with the left-wing faction that has controlled the CSU.

Herman declined to comment on that byelection.

Herman's deputy electoral officer, Youri Cormier, was the sole dissenting voice on the four-member judicial board. He was opposed to annulling the byelection, arguing that Schulz's slate had been hurt by the voting irregularities in November, yet it still managed to take the most votes.

To keep students informed and to encourage them to vote this time, Herman has set up a booth on the mezzanine of Concordia's downtown campus, where he, Cormier or their assistants are available daily for questions. This presence will allow students to observe them "running the actual election, in public, for all to see," Herman said. (There is also a booth at the Loyola campus.)

Herman said he has required all election workers to sign a "declaration of impartiality" that they will not favour any candidate or slate. He has also asked the administration to have the faculty remain impartial during the campaign.

He said he has also instituted new measures to reduce the risk of voter fraud. The identification numbers of students who vote will be kept up to date on an electronic enumeration system.

Herman, 27, a second-year political science student, said this was his first foray into student politics. He was appointed by an ad hoc CSU committee from among seven candidates after the position was advertised on campus.

His budget is just under $15,000.

Although he was named by the CSU, Herman said he has made it clear that their relationship is "arm's length."

"The CSU has been very co-operative. They understood when they hired me that this election would be very clean... As a student, I had never met or even heard of the chief electoral officer before me."

Concordia Hillel president Patrick Amar said he is concerned that the election dates mean Jewish students will have only one full day to vote because of the conflict with Passover. Nevertheless, he said Hillel is strongly urging its members to vote and is once again putting its support behind Schulz's team. Hillel also plans to support certain candidates for council. "We will be looking out for our best interests, as well as those of Concordia as a whole," Amar said.

Herman, who is Jewish, called conflict with Passover an "unfortunate coincidence," noting that CSU bylaws state the annual general election must be held so that "the polling period ends on the last Thursday in March."

About nine per cent of the 23,000 undergraduates voted in the last general election in March 2001. The November byelection drew 14 per cent.

A referendum on a number of issues is usually held along with the election. Herman said any student can propose a question if enough signatures are collected on a petition. Questions must be ratified by the CSU council before they are put to students.

One controversial question passed last year called on Canada to cut ties with Israel if it did not abide by United Nations Security Council Resolution 242.

AEPi conclave features Israeli ambassador

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's ambassador to Canada, Haim Divon, is the newest member of Alpha Epsilon Pi.

Divon – the keynote speaker at the Jewish fraternity's early March regional conclave in Toronto – was inducted as an honorary "brother" as part of the festivities, following in the footsteps of at least two of his counterparts based in the United States.

Divon spoke to more than 200 students at the Saturday night dinner of the conference, summarizing clearly and concisely the arguments necessary for students to counter anti-Israel sentiment on campus, said AEPi member Alexander Orwin.

The Mega Conclave, also known as the Northeast Conclave, took place at the Days Inn Toronto Downtown, with seminars on the University of Toronto campus. It attracted participants from as far away as Wisconsin, as well as Philadelphia, New York, Chicago and Ohio; and included members from the five largest Canadian chapters, which are based at Ryerson University, the University of Toronto, York University, the University of Western Ontario and McGill University, as well as a handful of smaller chapters.

In all, there are about 400 Canadian members in the 89-year-old fraternity.

As co-chair of the conclave, Jay Klein, a York University student, said his goals were to build unity among AEPi chapters in the Toronto region. There will be more joint programs in the near future, he added.

Sessions at the conclave focused on leadership skills and Israel education, said Klein. The weekend also included the induction of founding members of an Ottawa-based chapter.

Klein's co-chair Ben Reitzes, a third-year commerce and finance student at the University of Toronto, just wanted all the participants to have a good time, he said.

Although Israel advocacy is not part of AEPi's mandate, Reitzes believes the ambassador's participation in the conclave and also the existence of Aish HaTorah-sponsored free trips to Israel for AEPi members (www.jerusalemroadtrips.com) speaks of commitment to Israel.

Divon's talk was well received, said both Klein and Reitzes.

Following the keynote address, the fraternity hosted a party for about 1,400 students.

Klein, who said that party attendance has dropped in the past few years, was particularly enthused about the size of the crowd. "This will revitalize the AEPi party name," he said. "Everyone had a great time."

PM pledges support for Israel

Chrétien also repeated Canada's commitment to Israel's security. "Let there be no mistake: as far as Canada is concerned, there can be no just and lasting peace without the full guarantee of a safe and secure Israel."

In his response, Katsav thanked Chrétien and the Canadian government for their friendship and support in the fight against terrorism.

"Terrorism is a growing evil," Katsav said. "It represents a real danger to the Middle East, but also to the whole world. There should be no compromise in fighting terrorism. We have to fight terrorism with determination and co-operation and with no hesitation. No one around the world has immunity from terrorism."

At the dinner, longtime Liberal MP and former deputy prime minister Herb Gray was presented with a lifetime achievement award for his many years of public service.

Visibly moved by the presentation, Gray told the audience the evening was special "because this tribute is being paid to me in the presence of the prime minister of Canada and the president of Israel. Let the relationship between Canada and Israel be an example for the world as we seek for peace for Israel and for all mankind."

Among the dinner guests were Jews from across Canada, MPs and cabinet ministers from both Canada and Israel, and representatives of the Christian groups Watchmen for the Nations, Bridges for Peace and Christians for Israel.

The atmosphere at the dinner was in stark contrast to the one surrounding Foreign Minister Bill Graham earlier in the day at a CIC policy conference luncheon.

While his remarks to the gathering were generally supportive of Israel and applauded by the audience, Graham elicited some groans of disbelief and protest when he denied that educational materials for Palestinian children funded by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) contain racist and anti-Israel content.

Subsequent reports of Graham's presentation focused on harsher comments he had deleted from the text of his speech distributed prior to his address, and on his remark that "Israel's image as a vital and compassionate nation" would be compromised by the mounting toll of innocent civilian casualties among the Palestinians.

Shimon Fogel, the CIC's national executive director, said the media were determined to create a controversy about Graham's reference to Israel's self-defence policies. Fogel said some coverage tried to link Graham and Chrétien's comments to a similar incident in 1988 when then-external affairs minister Joe Clark criticized Israel at a CIC luncheon, while then-prime minister Brian Mulroney later affirmed Canada's friendship at a susequent dinner.

Commenting on Canada's policy toward Israel, Fogel said that "Canada has moved towards a more explicit recognition of Israel's right and obligation to defend its citizens."

In that context, Fogel said, Graham raised the question about the manner in which Israel exercised its right, but never questioned that right.

Fogel added there was no significant gap between Graham's afternoon speech and the prime minister's address later in the day.

חצעת השלום של סעודיה

לפני מספר חדשים שוחח תום פרידמן, העיתונאי של ניו יורק טיימס, עם יורש העצר הסעודי, שקשל מחלת אביו הוא השליט של מעצמת הנפט. בשיחה זו, שלא היתה לציטוט, אמר יורש העצר לראשונה שסעודיה תתחייב לשלום של כל מדינות ערב עם ישראל תמורת נסיגה מהגדה, הקמת מדינה פלשתינאית, תוך הכרה בשליטת ישראל בעיר העתיקה של ירושלים. תום פרידמן, יהודי חם ומנדולי העיתונאים בכל הזמנים, שאל את יורש העצר אם הוא מוכן להצהיר על תכנית כזו באופן פומבי, ויורש העצר אכן עשה זאת.

התגובות היו מעודדות מכל הצדדים. שרון עצמו שותק, אך עוזריו חביעו אופטימיות. יש כמובן חששות כבדים בחוגי הימין, כי הפתרון המוצע יכלול פינוי כל ההתנחלויות.

בתגובת ימין טיפוסית שמעתי ברדיו את זלמן שובל, שהוגדר כיועץ בכיר לשרון. הוא אמר: מה פתאום סעודיה, שמעולם לא התעניינה בשלום? אולי זה נסיון סעודי לתקן את הרושם שגין לאדן ואנשיו הם סעודים? ממש קשה להאמין שזה מה שמטריד את מר שובל. האם זה חשוב מי יזם את השלום? האם זה חזון להתחשבן עם מי שמוכן להוציא את הענלה הזאת מן הבוץ? כמה ישראלים יצטרכו עוד לשלם בחייהם לפני שיתחילו שני הצדדים במשהו קונקרטי לקראת שלום?

שאלת השאלות שתצטרך להיפתר היא זכות השיבה שהפלשתינאים דבקים בה. זה כמובן יהיה יהרג ולא יעבור עבורנו. הסעודים יצטרכו לעזור לעם הפלשתינאי לרדת מן העץ הזה, בדיוק כמו שהימין הישראלי יצטרך לרדת מן העץ של ארץ ישראל השלמה. ממילא הארץ מחולקת, ואין ישראלים רבים שחיים בתחום הקו הירוק שמסתובבים בגדה או מעוניינים לסכן את חייהם על ישוב יהודי שם. אבל שיישאר ביניהם.

תורים בשגרירויות

אחד המאפיינים של ההרגשה הישראלית היתה תמיד מידת הסיפוק של הישראלים מחיים בארץ למרות הקשיים, ומשאלי דעת קהל רבים לאורך השנים הוכיחו אחוז מאוד גבוה של ישראלים יהודים שאמרו שאין בכוונתם להגר. למי שמנסה להבין כמה חמור המצב הנוכחי בארץ לעצם קיומה כדאי להביא בחשבון את העובדות חבאות:

בחודשים האחרונים מגישים אלפי ישראלים בקשות להוציא דרכונים זרים. מסתבר שמדינות רבות באירופה מוכנות להוציא דרכונים גם לבני הדור השני של אזרחיהם, גם אם לא הם נולדו באותה במדינה. זה נכון לצרפת, אוסטריה, דנמרק ומדינות רבות אחרות. האמירה המקובלת היתה שחטרור הערבי אינו יכול לסכן את מדינת ישראל מבחינה פיזית. התורים הארוכים לדרכונים זרים חייבים להילקח במלוא הרצינות, כי הם מחוים אישור לסכנה חממשית שנשקפת למדינה.

גם על זה צריך לחשוב לפני שמגיבים בביטול על הצעת השלום הסעודית.

The Reader

נראה שאיני יכול להיפטר מהספר המדליק הזה. בשבוע שעבר בישרתי לכם שהספר יצא בעברית. אבל טעיתי בשמו: השם האמיתי הוא "הנער הקורא". ושוב תודה לאירית לפקין.

Iris

זהו סרט על זקנה, על אובדן הכוח, התבונה, והשליטה. איריס, סופרת ידועה ואדם מלא כרימון, שכל כוחה היה במלים ושימוש במלים, מאבדת את יכולת ההבנה. הדיבור והקריאה, וכשיוצא לאור ספרה האחרון אין היא מסוגלת לקרוא אפילו את הכותרת. יש שלקחו את הסרט כמדכא, אך היו כאלה, ואני ביניהם שראו בו את ניצחון האהבה והמסירות. רק לראות את ג'ודי דנץ' שווה את הכל. שוב ושוב ושוב- עליונות הקולנוע הבריטי החזק, הבלתי מזיף. שווה כדי לאפס את התושים אחרי כל הזבל שמנחיתים עלינו על המסך הקטן והגדול. תשע בסולם קורן.

Israelis are united though suffering

"We now feel alienated from the Palestinians. How can we not be? Their leaders constantly preach horrible incitement against us. Each child born into their society absorbs, as if it were with his mother's milk, unspeakable hatred towards Israel.

"This is what leads to terror.

"The Palestinians lack an independent press. Their journalism, their reportage reflect only extremist positions toward us. They think of Israelis, of Jews, as cruel monsters. The people are not given any opportunity to learn otherwise.

"Not long ago I invited 17 Palestinian journalists to meet with me. Through them, as it were, I wanted to talk to the 3,000,000 Palestinians alongside us, to show them who and what we are.

"The journalists – from print, radio and television – sat with me for more than 3 hours of long and sometimes hard conversation, questions and answers, interviews.

"Afterwards though, the Palestinian Authority refused to allow even one word of our conversations to appear in print or to be broadcast.

"The journalists were completely censored. This is one of the reasons for our problems. We have no way of talking with the Palestinian people.

"Their leadership suppresses them and brings disaster down upon them. They enjoy no rights, no freedoms, no democracy."

Do you see any chance for peace on the horizon?

"If [Palestinian Authority Chairman] Yasser Arafat doesn't understand that he has to take steps to stop the terror, it will inevitably lead to an escalation of violence. It all depends on what he will do. If he decides to put an end to terror, we can start official negotiations.

"He is now at a turning point between two paths: negotiations or an escalation of the violence. It rests on this one man.

"In essence, one man, Yasser Arafat, is steering the entire region."

In your view, is the recent Saudi peace initiative serious? (Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah outlined a plan to the New York Times for the Arab world to nomalize relations with Israel in return for a withdrawal to pre-1967 borders.)

"I cannot tell how serious [Crown Prince] Abdullah is. It might be that he's now getting cold feet. He took an initiative; but an initiative such as this is not introduced in the pages of a newspaper. One normally would find appropriate diplomatic channels to put forward such a plan.

"If he is serious, he should meet with government officials of Israel. If he wanted to, but felt personally unable to to do so, he could use the offices of a third country.

"I have publicly stated that I am ready to go to Riyadh to discuss his proposal. Moreover, I have even invited him to Jerusalem to present his ideas."

Have you received a response?

"No. Their public response has been simply: Take it or leave it. That is not the way to present a serious proposal for peace."

When you travel in Israel, do you see any points of hope?

"Despite the ongoing tragic situation, I am not pessimistic. We do, after all, have common interests with the Palestinians.

"We realize that peace requires a joint effort. As soon as the Palestinians realize this too, there will be peace. There really is no alternative for them.

"For its own viability, if and when it arises, some aspects of a Palestinian state will necessarily have to link its economy and its security with Israel."

Do the Egyptians play a helpful role?

"The Egyptians could do a lot more. They do not assist matters enough. They occupy an important position; [Egyptian] President [Hosni] Mubarak occupies a very important position in the Arab world. He also wields influence on the Palestinian leadership. I commend him for his recent suggestion to the Palestinians to end their terrorist activities. But as a leader of the Arab world, as a man of influence and the head of the country that has already made peace with Israel, he should plainly challenge Yasser Arafat to prove himself worthy of the title leader by bringing an end to the terrorism. If Mubarak were to speak forthrightly to Arafat, I am certain his words would be effective."

And what of other Arab countries – the Jordanians for example?

"The Jordanians are more limited in this area. They have less influence in the Arab world, but they too well understand the current dangers. Terrorism does not only threaten Israel, it threatens other countries in the Middle East as well. Indeed, Yasser Arafat threatens the stability of the entire region.

"He is like an individual who has to be restrained lest he cause harm to himself. His hands have to be tied.

"The free world must tie Arafat's hands; it must stop him from inflicting more harm upon his own people."

Is there a message you wish to impart to Canadians?

"We have a great deal in common with the Canadian people including shared values and beliefs in justice, democracy and morality. We are also both countries of many interwoven cultures.

"The Canadian and Israeli peoples both possess a pioneering spirit and a belief in the importance of ideals.

"I am pleased that the relations and the connections between our two nations are so good, so open and fruitful. And we will continue to foster these relations.

"Canadians recognize the value in mutual arrangements that relate to trade or scientific exchanges and research. They are not simply matters of economic or commercial interest. They are of value intrinsically, for their own sake, as a statement of friendship between our two countries.

'Not business as usual for community'

"Graham was called upon to provide some insight into Canada's Middle East foreign policy formulation while the prime minister was addressing the essence of the bilateral friendship between the two countries. The latter provides context to the former."

Graham's address made no reference to Canada's voting record at the United Nations, even though many in the Jewish community consider that voting record to be dubious and perplexing, a fact noted by CIC board member Donald Carr in his introduction to the luncheon.

In his closing remarks, CIC director Stephen Lipper thanked Graham for his support, but implored him to recognize that the situation in Israel is desperate.

"We know that Canada cares about Israel, but this is a unique time," Lipper said. "This community is in pain. We are in very deep pain because Israel is being threatened in a way it has never been threatened before. We look to Canada, a country we love and admire, for a just solution. We need Canada's help and we expect it.

"We hope to leave you with a message that it is not business as usual for this community," Lipper said. "We feel that to ignore the changed situation, which requires a different voting pattern, has been a terrible error on Canada's part. We hope to make changes in the Middle East by working with our beloved Canada because the situation is too important for us not to do something."

Hamilton woman raises funds for Israel's MDA

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Every time there's bad news from Israel, Hilda Rosen gets on the phone.

While she also calls Israel to make sure her friends there are safe, most of the calls she makes are local: Rosen is raising money in Hamilton for another Magen David Adom (MDA) ambulance, the fourth she has helped fund.

"When things in Israel are bad, that's when people want to help," she said.

"An ambulance can only take one person at a time, so if there's an incident where 30 people are wounded, you need that many ambulances to get everyone to hospital."

In the past six months, MDA, Israel's counterpart to the Red Cross, took care of almost 2,800 casualties – among them six of their own crew members. MDA maintains a fleet of about 600 emergency vehicles, nine of which are protectively reinforced. The organization provides the emergency medical and blood plasma services for all of Israel, and many of their drivers and paramedics are volunteers.

An ambulance costs about $83,000 (Cdn), and since MDA gets only a small percentage of its funding from the Israeli government, it depends on donations at home and abroad to buy its vehicles, equipment and supplies.

According to the MDA's most recent figures, Israel's emergency services are strained: between last September and this month, 74 MDA vehicles were damaged and taken out of service – including two hit by bullets. Other incidents also take them off the road: two ambulances were stolen and five broken into.

Replacing those vehicles is a priority, said Rosen, whose fund-raising is motivated by conversations with friends in Israel about the situation there.

One Canadian friend who works with Russian immigrants in Talpiot, whom Rosen described as "a very upbeat person," said for the first time recently that "there was a lot of fear and people don't want to go out.

"[The woman] said she calls her husband continually at the office to make sure he is OK. She feels no place is safe and that if it weren't for elderly family she has living in Israel, she would seriously considering coming back to Canada."

In her fund-raising efforts, Rosen gets help making calls from like-minded friends Rosslyn Sole, Zehava Chaimovitz and Ronnie Miller.

"We're all working very hard, and if any other community out there wants to be involved and share the mitzvah, we welcome them to join us," said Rosen.

(Last year, The CJN reported, Montreal raised funds for eight ambulances for MDA. Toronto bought six, while Vancouver bought two and Hamilton raised funds for one.)

While their latest $83,000 goal is daunting, Rosen said that, so far, she and her team have had a good response from Hamilton donors.

No one she called on one recent evening turned down her request for funds, she said. "Most people thank us profusely for doing this, because they want to do something to help."

The Western-Arab/Muslim divide

Just as the Persian Gulf War of 1991 forced the media to pay attention to the broader Middle East (temporary as that may have been), so too, the events of Sept. 11 and the U.S. campaign against terrorism have also, to a degree, pried open the camera's lens onto areas of the Middle East usually accorded insufficient attention. Many western journalists will be the first to admit that we know far too little about what is happening within the Arab/Muslim world, given the usual intense focus on Israeli-Palestinian affairs.

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week, this column drew attention to a recent CBC Radio documentary's insightful, oddly realistic portrait of the Saudi regime. Late last month, CBC-TV's The National aired Terence McKenna's riveting, detailed account of the most likely cause of the 1999 crash of Egypt Air 990 – the suicidal action of the co-pilot – and of the Egyptian denial of this finding. McKenna's summary reconstruction of events resulting in the crash that killed 217 people, including 22 Canadians, was precise and compelling. But it was his equally detailed profile of Egyptians' abject refusal to face the hard evidence (from a U.S. investigation) of the co-pilot's culpability that was truly disturbing.

As McKenna observed: "Over two years after the crash of Egypt Air 990, investigators from the U.S. National Transportation Safety Board [NTSB] have concluded that the Boeing 767 was intentionally brought down by its co-pilot, an act of suicide and mass murder. Here in Cairo and throughout Egypt though, apparently no one believes that."

And not only in Egypt, but in other areas of the Arab world as well. McKenna referred, for instance, to al-Jazeera, the Qatar-based TV network often praised in the West for offering more objective news than one finds elsewhere in the closed, tightly controlled Arab world.

But even al-Jazeera, having conducted its own simulator tests of Egypt Air's last minutes, concluded that the co-pilot, Gamil el-Batouty, could not have caused the plane to crash (even though the evidence clearly reveals that he turned off the autopilot and then forced the plane into a drastically steep dive, repeatedly declaring, "I rely on God").

McKenna went on to deal with the allegation that the Egyptian government deliberately obstructed the crash investigation, even trying "to alter… the conclusion of the NTSB report." Political pressure and the delicacy of U.S.-Egyptian relations have so far prevented the report's release.

If McKenna's documentary leads to any conclusion, it is surely that there is a cultural divide in some important instances between western and Arab/Muslim interpretations of events.

Community, politicians rally in solidarity with Israel

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montreal Jews assembled yet again in grief and anger to rally in solidarity with Israel following a wave of terrorist attacks the weekend of March 2-3 that killed 22, including a family of five.

As at previous rallies, speaker after speaker at the March 6, noon-time event in Dorchester Square denounced the terror as the crowd of about 300 struggled to stay warm on a sunny, yet bitterly cold day.

Thomas Hecht, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region (CIC-Q), called the latest incidents "dastardly," and rejected any "moral equivalence" between terrorist acts and Israeli retaliation.

Speaking prior to the annual CIC conference in Ottawa, Hecht called on Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Foreign Minister Bill Graham to tell Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to "declare war" on the terrorist infrastructure as he committed to do in the Oslo accords.

"For the terrorists, peace is a danger," said Joseph Gabay, Canadian-Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) president. "The battle against terrorism is everybody's business for all countries, all citizens for whom the words liberty and democracy represent real values."

Raymonde Folco, Liberal MP for Laval-West who is Jewish, pledged her government's commitment to peace and to playing any role it can to help end the violence.

"In the name of our government, I stand with you to condemn terrorism in the strongest possible terms," Folco said.

PQ MNA André Boulerice and Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman both expressed solidarity with the Jewish community.

"The cycle of violence has surpassed anything imaginable," said Boulerice, who referred to "my Jewish community."

"The Israeli people have the right to live, to live in peace, to live their culture, to live their language" in peace and security, he said.

Bergman, for his part, called the terrorist acts "unspeakable."

"Let the world remember that the Palestinians and their Arab partners have declared war on the Jews and the Jewish state for over a century," he said. "Israel will not stand by idly and watch Palestinians take the lives of innocent Israelis."

Orly Pinchuk, a Montreal medic who spent the two last summers volunteering with the Magen David Adom ambulance service in Israel, spoke personally about Sgt.-Maj. (res.) Yochai Porat, a paramedic who was shot by a Palestinian sniper after coming to the aid of three mortally wounded soldiers at a military checkpoint in the West Bank.

Struggling to maintain her composure, Pinchuk spoke about her friend who had helped to train the MDA volunteers and had become close with Pinchuk during her last stay in Israel.

"He was known for his intelligence, his kind heart and his undying devotion to Israel," said a tearful Pinchuk, who had continued to correspond with Porat by e-mail after she left Israel.

"He will be missed by his loving sister, brother, mother and father, hundreds of his students around the world, his co-workers and friends. "He was an inspiration to all of us. He will be missed."

Pinchuk's quiet personal remarks contrasted with the other speakers' comments as they strongly declared their solidarity with Israel.

Israeli Consul General Shlomo Avital said Israel "does not need a morality lesson from anybody" in how it deals with terrorists.

"We will continue to fight terror until we defeat it, and we can assure you we have all the means," he said.

How-to books for wide Jewish readership

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

If you've ever searched for a straightforward how-to book on Jewish matters, you'll know first-hand there's a real dearth out there. Visit the bookstore or library and you'll discover that most literature on marriage, birth, brit milah or how to live a Jewish life is penned by rabbis in a convoluted language that almost always assumes a great deal of reader knowledge.

Anita Diamant

So it's a relief to find works by Anita Diamant, a freelance journalist-turned-author who found herself frustrated by the shortage of Jewish how-to literature 15 years back, and by the fact that most of it did not recognize the range of Jewishness prevalent in North America today.

Diamant's books include The New Jewish Wedding, The New Jewish Baby Book, Living a Jewish Life: Jewish Traditions, Customs and Values for Today's Families, Life: A Handbook for People Converting to Judaism and for Their Family and Friends, Saying Kaddish, How To Comfort the Dying, Bury the Dead and Mourn as a Jew, and How to be a Jewish Parent.

It all started with her husband Jim, says Diamant, 50.

"I fell in love with someone who wasn't Jewish, and we started studying together," she said in a recent interview from her home in Newton, Mass. "At Jim's conversion classes, I asked a rabbi what I should read, and he said I should write something because there wasn't much out there."

Thus began her series of six Jewish handbooks, which, for the most part, follow the trajectory of Diamant's adult Jewish life from spousal conversion to Judaism to marriage, childbirth, parenting and grieving the death of a parent. This last topic was the most difficult and emotionally draining to write about, she said.

"I had lost my father a year earlier, and it was important that the tone of the book be appropriate to what people in mourning were feeling. When I wrote about sitting shivah, it was like sitting shivah for a month."

Raised in what she describes as an "ethnically Jewish" home in Newark, N.J., Diamant said her handbooks were not written for an Orthodox readership. She and her family are active in their Reform synagogue, and her books accentuate the prevalence of choices when it comes to living Jewishly rather than giving hard-and-fast rules.

"I live in a world where Jews make choices, and it was important to me that my books provide Jewish choices so that once they have some information in their hands, readers can make their own decisions," she said.

Her handbooks remain in print and sell steadily, she added, though "they're very targeted to a niche market."

Since turning 40, Diamant has moved towards fiction, publishing The Red Tent in 1997 and Good Harbor in 2001. The Red Tent, which eventually became a best-seller and today has been translated into many different languages with 1.5 million copies currently in print, is based on the story of Jacob in the book of Genesis, as told through the eyes of his daughter, Dinah. Good Harbor is about the relationship between two modern-day Jewish women.

"I think I'm done with the handbooks," she said, "though I'm involved in a project to build a mikvah, and after that I might write a book about it."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have been told by my doctor to add flaxseed to my diet to reduce the risk of heart disease and cancer. How do I eat flaxseed and how much?

A. I recommend starting with 1 tsp. and working up to 2 tbsp. of ground or milled flaxseed – not whole. It is very easy to add to anything because it has no taste, just a nutty texture. Add flaxseed to salads, soups, yogurt, tuna, muffins or cereal; or sprinkle it on toast with jam, cream cheese or peanut or almond butter (it will stick). It's also great with a peanut butter and jam sandwich.

Q. With Pesach approaching, I am concerned about how to keep my fibre intake up, as I have to forgo my usual high fibre cereal and toast, as well as flaxseed.
